This enormous mortgage takes from the earnings of the laboring people of the world $785,000,000 annually to pay interest to its owners; $785,000,000 of taxation laid upon the clothing that wraps the bodies of the poor, $785,000,000 of taxation laid upon the food that sustains human life, $785,000,000 extracted from the poor toiling people of the world, is a denial to that extent of the satisfaction of the wants, the comforts, and necessities of life. The governments that have created these debts, and laid these burdens upon the shoulders of the poor, take for their annual support three thousand millions more. Mr. Fenn, in his work on the public debts of the civilized world, said that in 1870 the debts and investments of the civilized world were over $30,000,000,000, and at the rate at which they were growing they would by the year 1900 reach $75,000,000,000. Then he overwhelmed us with the startling interrogatory: What then shall be the issue? The solution of this question is a subject that commends itself to every statesman. What is to be the issue? We can all answer it in the light of history. Increased taxation on labor, increased accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few, increased corruption in Government, increased destitution and suffering among the masses, increased pauperism and crime.

In the creation and retention of this vast funded debt, which presses like a mountain upon the shoulders of our people, all the salutary lessons of our fathers have been disregarded. They have warned us time and again to shun the dangerous rock; they have admonished us time and again that a public debt is a burden whose weight and proportions no power of mathematics can measure. The Continental Congress, as soon as peace with Great Britain was secured—a Congress composed of the same men who framed and gave to us the Constitution of the United States and founded the system of civil liberty which we now enjoy—called upon the States to invest them with power to lay duties upon imports, and urged them to levy upon themselves specific taxes to be set apart and pledged to the payment of the public debt within a period "not exceeding twenty-five years." In the spring of 1783 they called again upon the States for more power to lay duties and again earnestly urged the States to cede to the General Government their public lands to be sold to pay bounties due to the soldiers and to meet the claims of the public creditors. If there were no harm resulting from a public debt, why these urgent appeals for its extinguishment? In the language of Mr. Jefferson, in reference to a bill reported to Congress imposing taxes in 1812 to meet the expenditures of that war, "it was a dashing proposition." Think of those poor people, prostrated by a protracted and desolating war, their country laid waste on every side by marching armies, with a debt resting upon them equal in amount to the value of all their property, real, personal, and mixed; a country barely able to rise and stand upon its feet to receive the crown of victory. Think of the Congress of the General Government asking the States to tax themselves and give them power to tax the people again in imposing duties upon imports. Think of it and ask yourselves, why were they so earnest, so urgent, so importunate? What was the urgent necessity that induced the States to heed that appeal and pour into the lap of the Confederation the vast areas of their public lands? What great cause stirred the heart of the old Commonwealth of Virginia to respond to that call and cede to the General Government that vast empire of the Northwest, now grown into so many great States and the homes of so many happy and prosperous people? In the language of the appeal of Congress, it was "to hasten the extinguishment of the public debt."

Mr. Madison tells us that a public debt is a public curse, and worse in a republic than in any other form of government.

Mr. Hamilton, in his celebrated report, says:

It should be a fundamental maxim in the system of public credit of the United States that the creation of a debt should always be accompanied with the means of extinguishment.

He tells us that the payment—not the retention, but that the payment of a public debt is the only means of making public credit immortal. But the statesmanship which has conducted this country since the war does not seek the immortality of the public credit, but the immortality of the public debt, that capitalists and corporations and bankers and bondholders may riot in an immortality of spoliation and robbery levied upon the laboring masses of the country.

Mr. Gallatin told Mr. Jefferson, in some comments on his message in 1803, that one of three things had to be done: either taxation must be increased, or expenditures reduced, or the payment of the public debt retarded; and of these three he would not consent to the latter. He would not consent to the continuance of the public debt beyond the time when it could be paid. He would increase the taxes. He would reduce the expenditures, but he would not retard the payment of the public debt.

Mr. Jefferson, in his message of December, 1802, characterizes the public debt as a "moral canker" from which he anxiously looks forward to the emancipation of our posterity. It was but $80,000,000 at that time. It was small, but he knew how easy it would be to inflame that canker and make it spread all over the body-politic upon which it had fastened. He and all our revolutionary fathers looked forward to 1808, the period of twenty-five years, from 1783, for the extinguishment of our national debt. But, alas! when 1808 arrived the additions had been greater than the diminutions, as is usually the case with national debts, and the debt was found still to be $57,000,000. The war of 1812 coming on, it amounted to $127,000,000. The old father and founder of our system of government became alarmed, and his alarm increased with the debt; and, though in retirement, he addressed a letter, in 1813, to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House, urging upon him to bring before the House and press upon Congress the duty of paying that debt within the lives of the then living generation. I beg to commend the lessons of wisdom in that letter to my honorable friend, the chairman of the present Committee on Ways and Means. If these words were wise then they are much wiser to-day. The burden and the dangers of the public debt are eighteen times greater to-day than they were then; and the wisdom of this warning should fall with eighteen times more emphasis upon our ears than it did upon those who heard it then. I will read a few extracts from this letter:

It is a wise rule and should be fundamental in a government disposed to cherish its credit, but at the same time to restrain the use of it within the limits of its faculties, "never to borrow a dollar without laying a tax on the same instant for paying the interest annually, and the principal within a given term; and to consider that tax as pledged to the creditors on the public faith." On such a pledge as this, sacredly observed, a government may always command, on a reasonable interest, all the lendable money of their citizens, while the necessity of equivalent tax is a salutary warning to them and their constituents against oppression, bankruptcy, and its inevitable consequence, revolution. But the term of redemption must be moderate, and at any rate within the limits of their rightful powers. But what limits, it will be asked, does this prescribe to their powers? What is to hinder them from creating a perpetual debt? The laws of nature, I answer. The earth belongs to the living, not to the dead. The will and the power of man expire with his life, by nature's law.

In seeking then for an ultimate term for the redemption of our debts, let us rally to this principle and provide for their payment within the term of nineteen years at the farthest.—Volume 6, pages 136, 137.

Again, in the same year, he wrote to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means:

We must raise, then, ourselves the money for this war, either by taxes within the year, or by loans; and if by loans, we must repay them ourselves, proscribing forever the English practice of perpetual funding; the ruinous consequences of which, putting right out of the question, should be a sufficient warning to a considerate nation to avoid the example.—Volume 6, page 197.

He writes again to the same gentleman, in the same year:

At the time we were funding our national debt, we heard much about "a public debt being a public blessing;" that the stock representing it was a creation of active capital for the aliment of commerce, manufactures, and agriculture. This paradox was well adapted to the minds of believers in dreams, and the gulls of that size entered bona fide into it.—Volume 6, page 239.

To Mr. Monroe, then in Mr. Madison's Cabinet, he wrote in 1815, in which, while he readily admits that funding on specific redeeming taxes enables a nation to anticipate in war the resources of peace, he says:

The misfortune is, that in the mean time we shall plunge ourselves in unextinguishable debt, and entail on our posterity an inheritance of eternal taxes, which will bring our Government and people into the condition of those of England, a nation of pikes and gudgeons, the latter bred merely as food for the former.—Volume 6, page 400.

To Mr. Gallatin, minister to France, he writes in 1815:

Put down the banks, and if this country could not be carried through the longest war, against her most powerful enemy, without ever knowing the want of a dollar, without dependence on the traitorous classes of her citizens, without bearing hard on the resources of the people or loading the public with an indefinite burden of debt, I know nothing of my countrymen.—Volume 6, page 498.

To John Taylor, of Caroline, he wrote in 1816:

Funding I consider as limited, rightfully, to a redemption of the debt within the lives of a majority of the generation contracting it; every generation coming equally, by the laws of the Creator of the world, to the free possession of the earth he made for their subsistence, unencumbered by their predecessors, who, like them, were but tenants for life.

And I sincerely believe, with you, that banking establishments are more dangerous than standing armies; and that the principle of spending money to be paid by posterity, under the name of funding is but swindling futurity on a large scale.—Volume 6, pages 605-608.

To William H. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury, in 1816, he writes:

No earthly consideration could induce my consent to contract such a debt as England has by her wars for commerce, to reduce our citizens by taxes to such wretchedness, as that laboring sixteen of the twenty-four hours, they are still unable to afford themselves bread, or barely to earn as much oatmeal or potatoes as will keep soul and body together.—Volume 7, page 7.

Again, in 1816, he writes to Mr. Kerchival:

I am not among those who fear the people. They and not the rich are our dependence for continued freedom. And to preserve their independence, we must not let our rulers load us with perpetual debt. We must make our election between economy and liberty, or profusion and servitude. If we run into such debts as that we must be taxed in our meat and in our drink, in our necessities and our comforts, in our labors and our amusements, for our callings and our creeds, as the people of England are, our people, like them, must come to labor sixteen hours in the twenty-four, give the earnings of fifteen of these to the Government for their debts and daily expenses; and the sixteenth being insufficient to afford us bread, we must live as they now do, on oatmeal and potatoes; have no time to think, no means of calling the mismanagers to account, but be glad to obtain subsistence by hiring ourselves to rivet their chains on the necks of our fellow-sufferers. Our landholders, too, like theirs, retaining indeed the title and stewardship of estates called theirs, but held in trust for the Treasury, must wander, like theirs in foreign countries, and be contented with penury, obscurity, exile, and the glory of the nation. This example reads to us the salutary lesson that private fortunes are destroyed by public as well as by private extravagance. And this is the tendency of all known governments. A departure from principle in one instance becomes a precedent for a second, that second for a third, and so on till the bulk of the society is reduced to be mere automatons of misery, to have no sensibilities left but for sinning and suffering. Then begins, indeed, the bellum omnium in omnia, which some philosophers, observing to be so general in this world, have mistaken it for the natural instead of the abusive state of man. And the forehorse of this frightful team is public debt. Taxation follows that, and in its turn wretchedness and oppression.—Volume 7, page 14.

To Governor Plumer in 1816, he writes:

I place economy among the first and most important of republican virtues, and public debt as the greatest of the dangers to be feared. We see in England the consequences of the want of it, their laborers reduced to live on a penny in the shilling of their earnings, to give up bread, and resort to oatmeal and potatoes for food; and their landholders exiling themselves to live in penury and obscurity abroad, because at home the government must have all the clear profits of their land. In fact, they see the fee-simple of the island transferred to the public creditors, all its profits going to them for the interest of their debts. Our laborers and landholders must come to this also, unless they serenely adhere to the economy you recommend.—Volume 7, page 19.

Again, in 1816, he writes to ex-President John Adams:

What do you think of the present situation of England? Is not this the great and fatal crash of their funding system, which, like death, has been foreseen by all but its hour, like that of death, hidden from mortal prescience? It appears to me that all the circumstances now exist which render recovery desperate. The interest of the national debt is now equal to such a portion of the profits of all the land and the labor of the island as not to leave enough for the subsistence of those who labor. Hence, the owners of the land abandon it and retire to other countries and the laborer has not enough of his earnings left to him to cover his back and to fill his belly. The local insurrections, now almost general, are of the hungry and the naked who cannot be quieted but by food and raiment. But where are the means of feeding and clothing them?—Volume 7, page 40.

In a letter to Hon. Edward Everett, in 1822, he says:

I have long considered the present crisis of England and the origin of the evils which are lowering over her as produced by enormous excess of her expenditures beyond her income. To pay even the interest of the debt contracted she is obliged to take from the industrious so much of their earnings as not to leave enough for their backs and bellies. They are daily, therefore, passing over to the pauper list, to subsist on the declining means of those still holding up, and when these also shall be exhausted, what next?

Andrew Jackson, in his inaugural address, in 1829, says:

The unnecessary duration of a national debt is incompatible with real independence.

So deeply was he impressed with the fearful consequences that follow the continuance of public debts that he waged relentless war against it and its offspring, the national bank. His tenure of the Chief-Magistracy was distinguished by the double victory that annihilated both the debt and the bank. In his message to Congress in 1833 he says:

If Providence permits me to meet you in another session, I shall have the high gratification of announcing to you that the national debt is extinguished. I cannot refrain from expressing the pleasure I feel at the near approach of that desirable event.

Mr. Calhoun said in his place in the Senate:

My aversion to a public debt is deep and durable. It is in my opinion pernicious, and is little short of fraud on the people.

Mr. Ingham, Secretary of the Treasury, in one of his reports, says:

Whatever the considerations of public policy that have made the rapid extinguishment of the public debt a favorite object of the nation, it is known that the public creditor regards it, individually, as a hardship to be paid off.

Mr. McLane, Secretary of the Treasury, in one of his reports, says:

It will be a proud day for the American people when to all those noble characteristics which have rendered their career so memorable among nations they shall add the rare happiness of being a nation without debt.

From the beginning of the debt to its close there was no time when it exceeded one hundred and twenty-seven millions, yet when it was paid in 1835 it had cost the people of the United States four hundred and thirty-one millions. Mr. Jefferson tells us at one time it had been "juggled" from forty-three up to eighty millions. Juggling is one of the familiar features in the family of that name. Our present debt was juggled in 1869 from thirteen hundred and seventy-one millions to two thousand and forty-nine millions. The English funded debt was juggled between 1793 and 1816 from sixteen hundred and forty-five millions to twenty-nine hundred and thirty-three millions. This is one of the prominent benefactions it always bestows, and I doubt not if we could ascertain the history of all the public debts in the world we would see the brand upon all their foreheads.

Mr. Jefferson tells us when we were funding our revolutionary debt we heard a great deal about a public debt being a public blessing. We heard the same when we were funding our present debt. The English heard the same when they were funding theirs. But whenever and wherever it has been heard "it is the bugle blast of a robber band."

Mr. Chairman, we have heard to-day the republican party extolled to the skies by the gentleman from Maine for the wisdom it displayed since the war in the management of the finances. Whatever of praise or censure is due belong to that party, for they have had continued control of the Government. It was a republican administration that negotiated the bonds. It was their administration that appointed the agent who sold them. They are bound by his acts and utterances as much as by those of Mr. Chase, who appointed him. In speaking for the Administration and his party, he says:

We lay down the proposition that our national debt, made permanent and rightly managed, will be a national blessing.

The funded debt of the United States is the addition of $3,000,000,000 to the previously realized wealth of the nation. It is three thousand millions added to the available active capital. To pay this debt would be to extinguish this capital and to lose this wealth. To extinguish this capital and lose this wealth would be an inconceivably great national misfortune.

In the above clear statement of the proposition, as the agent of the Administration, he was pleading with the capitalist, and opening the way for an alliance between him and the republican party. The overtures were accepted and the union consummated. Here is what he says to the manufacturers:

The maintenance of our national debt is protection. The destruction of it by payment is bondage again to the manufacturers of Europe.

It is hardly necessary to say that the manufacturers were won by this frank avowal of their cause in their contest with the people whom they were prostrating by high tariff legislation.

Here is what he says to the national bankers:

That is not a hazardous opinion which declares that in less than twenty years our national bank note circulation will be $1,000,000,000. * * * The currency that sixty-one millions of people, unequaled in industry and untrammelled in enterprise, will require, has got to have the basis of a national debt. There is no other foundation for it to stand on that will impart to it at once security and nationality.

He urges the repeal of the income tax, says "it should be scornfully abandoned, and that, too, right speedily and forever." That "indirect and not direct taxation should be the order of the day." He maintains that "there is no just way of discharging a national debt except by apportioning the interest to generation after generation in perpetuity." Whatever else may be said of the doctrines taught by the agents of Mr. Chase, their courage and boldness would have done honor to any highwaymen that ever infested the road. There are gems of wisdom and statesmanship in these utterances for which the gentleman failed to give the proper credit to his party to-day. Jay Cooke, the agent of the Administration, lays down the doctrine of the capitalist, the manufacturer, and the national banker, that the national debt is a national blessing. He does not dodge the question as some of our statesmen do who profess to hate the public debt while bringing before Congress and urging the passage of a bill to refund the debt and throw it upon future generations that its blessing may be perpetuated. He boldly comes out of his hiding-place, boldly declares the virtue of legislative robbery, and stands by it as a fearless champion of the highway.

Now, sir, I desire to read from another distinguished leader of the republican party, and one of the strongest advocates of manufacturing monopoly in the United States. I read from a speech made by my colleague, Judge KELLEY, in 1867:

Mr. Chairman, within an hour of the opening of the present session I introduced the following resolution, which was adopted without dissent:

"That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of immediately repealing the provisions of the internal-revenue law whereby a tax of 5 per cent. is imposed on the products of the mechanical and manufacturing industry of the country."

On the succeeding Monday, having in the mean time examined the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I submitted the following:

"Resolved, That the war debt of the country should be extinguished by the generation that contracted it is not sanctioned by sound principles of national economy, and does not meet the approval of this House."

Here was a square issue made between Jefferson, Madison, Hamilton, Gallatin, Jackson, Calhoun, and all the fathers on one side, and the representatives of the capitalist, the national banker, and the manufacturer on the other. And what was the result? It was that Congress, under the control of that party so highly eulogized to-day, did scornfully abandon the income tax, and that right speedily. They did repeal the tax that was imposed on the two thousand millions of capital invested in manufactures, and upon which forty thousand persons realized a net profit of over 40 per cent. They did repeal the tax imposed upon the five thousand millions invested in railroads that brought to its owners a net annual income of one hundred and eighty-five millions. They did repeal all tax upon the less than three hundred thousand persons who had a net annual income of over $800,000,000. They released over two hundred millions of annual revenues to the wealthy; but what act of generous kindness did they do toward that vast army of laborers who eat their daily bread by the sweat of their brow—the thirty-eight millions of people that had no income, that made only a support, and nothing more? They increased their taxes.

Why were these taxes on wealth given away? It was to prevent the payment of the public debt. If they had all been retained as firmly as the taxes on the poor man's food and clothing we would have been to-day without a dollar of national debt; but the manufacturer did not want the national debt paid, because the $100,000,000 that the laboring people had to pay for its interest was levied on foreign goods they had to buy, and its price fixed the price of the domestic manufacturer's goods, and the people had to pay both, and their wealth was released from taxation. Why should not the national debt be to them a national blessing? The capitalist did not want the debt paid. So he was exempted from paying any taxes on his bonds and income, how did it injure him? If it were paid, where was he to find a safe and profitable investment for his large wealth? Who is to "seal up his eyelids and steep his senses in forgetfulness" when he lays down at night with his money scattered all over the country among bankrupt and absconding debtors? Now his vast wealth is safely invested, and he has a mortgage decreed by law upon all the labor of all the people and all the civil and military power of the Government held in readiness to collect and pay his quarterly interest. Will any one suppose that Mr. Vanderbilt, with his thirty millions of United States bonds, paying him an annual interest of twelve hundred thousand dollars, desires to see the public debt paid? Would a man whose monthly income was $100,000 for interest due on his bonds want to see these bonds paid? Would he not be likely to exert a powerful influence upon Congress to hold and prolong the debt, and keep the necks of the toilers bent under the burden from which he received such enormous benefits? No one is astonished that the stockholders of national banks clamor for the retention of the national debt. It is a very natural thing for them to praise the bridge that carries them safely over. Their very existence is bound up in the public debt. They live with the public debt and expire with the public debt. National debts and national banks are two monsters through whose veins flows the blood of but one life.

If the debt is paid, as Jay Cooke says they have no basis to stand upon. Standing upon the debt "they have," in the language of Mr. Jefferson, "the regulation of the safety-valves of our fortunes to condense and explode them at their will." Under their dominion, as he says, "the country is abandoned to the avarice and jugglings of private individuals to regulate according to their own interests the quantum of circulating medium for the nation, to inflate by deluges of paper the nominal prices of property, and then to buy up that property at one shilling on the pound, having first withdrawn the floating medium which might endanger a competition in purchase." In 1820 the banks had control of our circulation, and contracted it fearfully, and what was the result? Let the old father and founder of American democracy answer. He says:

This State [Virginia] is in a condition of unparalleled distress. The sudden reduction of the circulating medium from a plethora to all but annihilation is producing an entire revolution of fortune.

No wonder that he said "bank paper must be suppressed, and the circulating medium must be restored to the nation, to whom it belongs."

No wonder that he said that the bank mania "is raising up a moneyed aristocracy in our country which has already set the Government at defiance."

No wonder that he said, "If we suffer the moral of the present lesson to pass away without improvement by the eternal suppression of bank paper, then indeed is the condition of our country desperate."

No wonder that he said, "Interdict forever to both the State and National Governments the power of establishing any paper bank."

No wonder that he said "their object is to enrich swindlers at the expense of the honest and industrious part of the nation."

No wonder he says, "Let us be allured by no projects of banks, public or private, or ephemeral expedients, which, enabling us to gasp and flounder a little longer, only increase by protracting the agonies of death."

No wonder he said in 1815, "The Government is now issuing Treasury notes for circulation, bottomed on solid funds, and bearing interest. The banking confederacy will endeavor to crush the credit of these notes; but the country is eager for them, as something they can trust to, and so soon as a convenient quantity of them can get into circulation, the bank-notes die."

Sixty-five years have passed since that utterance was penned, but the banking confederacy are as determined to-day to crush the credit of the Treasury notes as they were then. They clamor for the legal-tender quality—the compulsory debt-paying power—to be taken away from them, that they may drive them back into the Treasury and compel them to capitulate at discretion. They know when they have taken the legal tender from the Treasury note they have disarmed their enemy on the field, and he must give up the fight. If the Treasury note is retired, then the bank-note will take its place, and we will soon have Jay Cooke's one thousand millions in circulation, and more than a thousand millions of debt retained, refunded from generation to generation "in perpetuity" for them to stand on.

Capitalists, bankers, and manufacturers have always been the warm advocates, the fast friends of a public debt. General Jackson charged the United States Bank, when seeking a renewal of its charter in 1832, with the employment of every means in its power to defeat the payment of the public debt. He said it did not hesitate to use its funds to control the press. Are they not spending ten times the money to-day to control the press that they did then. How many presses to-day in the United States are controlled by banking and manufacturing monopolies? They are to-day and always have been in league, offensive and defensive.

In 1837, after the debt was paid, when we had no taxes save duties on imports and the revenues of the Government were more than were necessary for its expenses, the representatives of the toiling people of the United States found themselves overmatched by the combined forces of the manufacturers and bankers, and a law was passed that took from the coffers of the Government $37,000,000 and gave it to the States, and some of the States actually gave back the money per capita to their citizens.

In 1841, while Congress was discussing a bill to borrow $12,000,000 on Government bonds, another bill was lying upon their table and receiving the same support as the loan bill that provided for the distribution of over $3,000,000, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, among the States.

What did all this mean? The manufacturers preferred to give back the money in the Treasury to the people rather than reduce the tariff and give up the profits it gave them in raising the prices of their commodities. It mattered not what the Treasury lost, they retained their spoil, and the bankers were willing to give away the treasures of the Government that it might create a bonded debt for the new bank to stand upon, which they were creating but which expired on a presidential veto. It is not a matter to excite one's special wonder that the moneyed aristocracy are found proclaiming the great source of blessings that a public debt bestows; nor is it a matter of profound astonishment that when the war was over their representatives with such haste demanded the repeal of taxes on wealth from which the Government was receiving over two hundred millions annually. But how does the debt affect the laboring people? Are those that toil in the great hive of our industries benefited? What has indirect taxes, the favorite of the moneyed aristocracy, accomplished? What is indirect taxation? It is taxation levied on food, clothing, and the implements of labor. Direct taxes are taxes levied on wealth. One is laid upon the rich, the other upon the poor. The direct taxes were all repealed; the other is left to us and has been increased. Indirect taxation is one of the most insidious instrumentalities for the spoliation of a whole nation that the ingenuity of man could invent. While the system itself is unjust in its manifest inequality that is the least objection to it. It concentrates rapidly the national wealth into a few hands and leaves suffering and distress to the masses. If the duty on an article were 100 per cent. and ten millions were imported the Government would receive ten millions. That would be an exorbitant tax. But if a hundred millions of the same article were manufactured and sold at the same price the people who bought and consumed all over the country would pay a hundred millions to the home manufacturer. This system of taxation soon makes a millionaire of one and a mendicant of the other.

No nation on earth, I care not what may be its resources, can for a number of years support the taxation required by a large public debt and high tariffs, with its circulating medium in the control of corporations, without entailing great suffering and distress among the masses of its people. They are three powerful causes conspiring together, and in constant and sleepless activity, to gather into the hands of a few all the annual earnings of labor. This system of depletion and concentration continued for a long time reaches a point of exhaustion when a large element of the population feel intense suffering for the want of food and clothing. Then the foundations of civil society are upheaved, and wealth, sensitive to its weakness, begins its intrigues for a stronger government, a government that leans for repose upon a powerful military establishment. The people of the United States have felt the pang of suffering, but there are keener pangs and a deeper destitution yet to be felt by a large part of the population if the triumvirate of public debt, high tariff, and national banks are to be continued for any considerable time. The tariff itself takes from the earnings of the people not less than twelve hundred millions annually; and national banks, as they expand and contract, swindle and defraud the people to even a greater extent. No free government can exist where great wealth is in the hands of the few and the masses of the people are reduced to poverty. A great American statesman tells us that a distribution of pecuniary power is as essential to the preservation of free government as a distribution of political power. And this is no new doctrine. Sir Francis Bacon said, three centuries ago:

Above all things, good policy is to be used, that the treasure and moneys in a State be not gathered into few hands; for otherwise a State may have a good stock and yet starve; and money is like muck—no good unless it be spread.

John Taylor, of Caroline, a distinguished statesman of Virginia in the early dawn of the Republic, in a work on the principles of government tells us:

A free form of government cannot last if heavy taxes continue till the poverty of the payers and the wealth of the receivers have separated the nation into two orders far apart.

If the people of the United States desire to remain free, to enjoy happiness, and to control their government for their own well-being, they must destroy excessive indirect taxation, extinguish the public debt as rapidly as possible, and as rapidly as possible take control of their circulating medium. They must see to it that taxation levied on necessary articles of daily consumption is reduced to the lowest possible figure, and a just and reasonable share of the burdens of government is imposed upon the capital and income of the wealthy classes. A system of revenue that exempts the wealthy from taxation is unjust and ruinous in the extreme; but when it goes further, and loads foreign goods with heavy taxes in order to raise the price to the poor of all the necessities of life, stealthily and indirectly taking from them all their earnings, and reducing them eventually to pauperism, it is sinful and wicked.

Let us see how the wealth of this country has been concentrated by indirect taxation. In 1860 the nine Eastern States where the capital is held that controlled our manufactures and currency had one-third of the people and one-third of the national wealth. In 1861 the country had foisted upon it the present excessive tariff, and in 1870 the census showed the nine Eastern States had retained their proportion of population, one-third, but they had gained one-half of the wealth. They had five billions of values more than their proportion. The masses in these States were as poor as in the other portions of the country. It was the few who had gained the great wealth.

On the 21st of May, 1878, Mr. Burchard, of Illinois, then a member of this House, delivered a speech in this Hall, from which I extract the following:

A New York paper, the Monetary World, publishes the following:
NEW YORK MILLIONAIRES.

Surely this wealth accumulated and held by eighteen families ought to pay its proportional share of the governmental expenses.

Here are eighteen families who have $248,000,000, not one dollar of which contributes anything to the support of the Government. They all live upon one street; there are others on other streets of that city who count their wealth by millions, but there is not a laborer in that great city of a million of people who does not contribute as much to support the Government as the wealthiest in that list. The wealth that is gathering in the hands of a few is not only large, but enormous. We were told a few days ago that a distinguished lady from the East attended a reception at the White House with $800,000 of diamonds on her person, accompanied by two policemen and a detective. Is this republican simplicity? Is it not coming events "casting their shadows before?" When a million of dollars may be expended in personal adornment will any one tell us at this day that such vast wealth is not dangerous to the state? Then why did our fathers declare in all the early constitutions of government that perpetuities and monopolies were contrary to the genius of a free people and prohibit them? Why was entailment forbidden by them in all the early charters of government they formed for us? Why were laws written upon the statute-books providing for the distribution among children of decedents' estates? If concentrated wealth is not dangerous to free governments these were acts and utterances of supreme folly. The distinguished chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Hon. FERNANDO WOOD,] in an interview published in one of the papers of his city, says:

The great danger to our institutions does not lie in any attempt to subvert the Government by force of arms, nor in sectional controversy or strife, nor in violence of party conflict, but does lie in the erection of mammoth syndicates and monopolies who are aggregating into the hands of the few the products of industry of the many, and who by the money power thus created will reduce and conquer the State governments as well as the Federal Government. Already some of these interests are making Senators and members of the House of Representatives, and it will not be long before they will make a President of the United States.

I cordially agree with him that the danger to our institutions lies in the creation of a powerful money class. But its control in the enactment and enforcement of laws must at last lead to force for its support. Its influence will be exerted to gather into their coffers all that can be extorted by law from the products of labor. There will be no limit to their lust for gold. They will find Representatives in these Chambers obsequious to their will, or they will put them here. In the name of liberty they will enslave the masses to satisfy the greed of their masters. In the name of patriotism they will destroy the country, and, boasting of their superior learning and civilization, they will sink the land into a night of barbarism.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have seen what classes have been benefited by national debts. But there is a large class in this country whose interests are affected and we should see whether they are benefited or not. Are the laboring people of the United States benefited? Is the toiler in the shop, in the field, and on the farm benefited, when he is compelled to pay 100 per cent. duty on the woolen coat that protects him in the chilling winds of winter as he goes forth to labor to make up the money necessary to pay the interest to the bondholder? Is he benefited when he has to pay 65 and 70 per cent. on the sugar that goes into his coffee in order to make up the interest that goes to the capitalist? Is he benefited when he has to pay 100 per cent. on the wool hat he puts on his head when he goes out to toil for the scanty subsistence he can get by his labor? Please tell me where this great army of toilers is benefited by a national debt, the interest on which is thus extorted from them?

We have a lamp by which our feet are guided in solving that inquiry. The people from whom came our ancestors that crossed the waters to this continent have enjoyed this inestimable blessing for two hundred years. How has it affected them? What voice does the toiling people of Great Britain send over to us as their verdict upon their national debt? With the advent of the house of Orange, as my friend from Georgia [Mr. FELTON] has told you, the national debt of England began its existence. It was a mere bagatelle when William of Orange mounted the throne. It was but sixty millions when he left it. But history tells us that no prince that ever sat upon the throne of Great Britain ever felt so keenly the truth of that utterance which Shakespeare put into the mouth of Henry IV, "uneasy lies the head that wears a crown."

He was a foreigner, supported by foreign bayonets, without a party attached to his person. When he arrived there one-half of the people were questioning his title, and the other half were warring against his prerogatives. The whole country was quivering with convulsions under his feet. Scotland was hesitating whether she would welcome him with a salutation or a blow. Ireland was in open war and throwing her gauntlet at his feet bade him welcome to the arbitrament of battle.

He listened to the sweet siren voice of the charmer and threw the influence of the Crown in support of the policy of building up a national debt, to bind, as they told him, the ligaments of a powerful moneyed class to his throne to support it as it reeled and staggered in the throes of revolution. Scarcely had it existed a dozen years when the Bank of England, the result of taxation and of oppression, came forth like a monster from its loins. It was then we heard that a national debt was a national blessing, that it was a godsend to the people, that it was a mine of gold, that it was so much added to the national wealth by the magic influence of national credit, and all such flippant fallacies as those. Ah! Mr. Chairman, it was a "godsend" to one class; it was a godsend to the capitalists who had millions gathered together. It took the tax-gatherer from their doors and bade him go forth not with a blessing as of old to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, but to go forth and lay heavy exactions upon the poor toiling millions of her industrious peasantry; to tax their shirts, their drawers, their socks, their shoes, their hats, the beds on which they slept, the implements with which they labored, even the winding-sheets in which they were wrapped when they died, and the very spade that dug their graves where they were laid in their last repose. But not one dollar did they take from the great aggregated wealth of the capitalists. It was a "godsend" to the capitalists, but it was a devil-send to the poor peasants of that ill-governed land.

We have heard the financial policy of Great Britain extolled by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.] And he pays a tribute to Sir Robert Walpole for having performed wonders in the way of refunding the national debt of Great Britain from a higher into a lower interest debt.

Mr. Chairman, there were two great premiers in Great Britain in different times. There was one named Pitt and there was one named Walpole. Their policies were as divergent as honesty from dishonesty. Walpole ruled Great Britain by making the throne great in defiance of its people. Walpole ruled Great Britain with gold. Pitt ruled Great Britain with the aspiration of making the English people a proud, powerful, and happy nation. Pitt made the peasantry of Great Britain potent; Walpole made them powerless. Pitt wielded the Parliament by appeals to their patriotism; Walpole to their pockets. It was the tireless aim of Pitt to secure Englishmen in all their ancient rights, and Walpole to make the throne omnipotent in its claim of prerogatives.

Pitt held the helm of Great Britain from 1800 until he died, during the war of Napoleon Bonaparte, shortly after the battle of Austerlitz. When Pitt came into the control of the administration of Great Britain did he sell any bonds? Did he fund any debt? What was his record? He laid an income tax of 10 per cent. upon the wealthy capitalists of Great Britain. And what did Mr. Gladstone tell us in 1853 was the result of that policy? It was that Pitt paid all the expenses of the government, all its civil lists, all its war expenditures in that tremendous contest with Napoleon Bonaparte, perhaps the greatest the world ever saw until within the last few years in our own country. He did all this and had left every year seven million pounds sterling to apply to the reduction of the debt which Walpole and his predecessors had entailed upon the nation through their bad administration. Through the income tax and other taxes he paid all the expenditures of the great war, did not fund a dollar, and had $35,000,000 in excess every year. Mr. Gladstone in submitting his budget to the Parliament of Great Britain in 1853 said that it was "a most remarkable fact." It is a remarkable fact, and one that should commend itself to the consideration of our statesmen to-day. That debt went on growing year by year until in 1835, the year that our debt was extinguished, it amounted to $3,800,000,000. From November 5, 1688, to March 31, 1877, the British people had paid in interest on their debt $12,572,263,345, while they had paid at the same time toward the reduction of its principal $17,142,502,925. The whole sum paid during that time amounted to $30,014,771,370.

Mr. BARBER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. BARBER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the national debt of Great Britain was not increased by the Napoleonic wars?

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Gladstone says that from 1806 to 1815 under Pitt, it was not increased; that is, he said that the annual expenditures of the war during that time were paid, besides all ordinary expenditures of government and $35,000,000 surplus.

Mr. BARBER. Does not the gentleman know that Lord John Russell, in discussing that question of the acts of Mr. Fox and Mr. Pitt, says that Mr. Pitt placed an everlasting burden on the industry of England?

Mr. MILLS. I leave that question with Mr. Gladstone and the gentleman from Illinois. I have not now time to discuss it. I have quoted from him his exact words which he submitted to the Parliament of Great Britain, and they were not questioned at the time by any one of its members.

This debt went on growing. It rose and fell like the tides of the sea, but like the sea its vast volume still remains.

It rose from 1835 to 1837.

It fell from 1837 to 1839.

It rose from 1839 to 1842.

It fell from 1842 to 1847.

It rose from 1847 to 1849.

It fell from 1849 to 1854.

It rose from 1854 to 1857.

It fell from 1857 to 1875.

It rose from 1875 to 1877.

It is $10,000,000 to-day larger than it was in 1835, notwithstanding the fact that the people of Great Britain have paid in that time on that debt $5,000,000,000; notwithstanding the vast amount which they have paid on that debt during the two centuries of its existence, a sum nearly as great as all the property, real, personal, and mixed, owned by all the people of the United States to-day. Our total wealth is not over forty or forty-two billions of dollars, and they in 1877 had paid on their debt over thirty billions.

One English writer tells us in his work that all the money borrowed by England has been paid five times over, in the shape of interest, without one jot of progress toward ultimate relief; but another one in his book takes a much more cheerful view of the subject; thinks if all future wars could be avoided and rigid economy practiced the debt might be paid in seven hundred years. How I do love a man of a cheerful and hopeful heart! How often his smiles kindle daylight in our bosoms when we are ready to sink into a night of gloom and despair. That declaration revived my drooping spirit like the warm breath of summer would the despondent spirit of a mariner floating in ice fields in an arctic winter. Two hundred years in the past and seven hundred in the future are but nine hundred years in all, and that is but a trifle to give in exchange for such incalculable benefits as syndicates, corporations, stock-jobbers, and gamblers confer upon the government in quieting the refractory elements in Parliament and making the throne immovable in every storm of state. If they have paid thirty thousand millions in the two centuries that have passed, will some mathematician tell me how much they will have paid when the year of jubilee shall come, when liberty shall be proclaimed throughout the land, and the trumpet shall sound the glad notes of deliverance; when the captive shall go out from captivity and return again to the land of his fathers.

It has filled her poor-houses with paupers, her penitentiaries with criminals, and her whole land with the deepest distress. Mr. Gibbon tells us:

It has gone on grinding the people to powder until one in every twenty of them is reduced to the necessity of begging for a subsistence.

He might as truthfully have added it has imposed a yearly burden of $74,000,000 upon those descending to pauperism to support those who have already reached it. She paid for the support of her paupers from 1849 to 1879 over $2,000,000,000. An English writer referring to "the appalling mass of pauperism" asks from whence it arises? and says it is from a vicious system of taxation that takes three-fifths of all the revenues by customs and excises levied on articles of general consumption. He tells us that customs and excises are the father and mother of British pauperism. Paradoxical as it may seem, the national wealth of Great Britain has increased in an equal ratio with national pauperism. The great army of laborers have risen early and retired late, have toiled from dawn till dark, and have created a vast amount of wealth; but their earnings ran into the coffers of the capitalists and fundholders just as the rain-drops run into the sea. How many mouths have dried with hunger, how many backs have shivered with cold, how many destitute have gone without shelter, how many bosoms have grown heavy with sighs, how many eyes have poured their griefs in unavailing tears while this vast sum was being taken from the poor to swell the treasures of the bondholders, the eye of God alone hath seen.

In 1847 the public debt of Great Britain was owned by 275,839 persons; of that number 2,089 persons owned fifteen hundred millions or nearly one-half of the whole amount. Each one of them owned $750,000, and each received an annual interest on his bonds of $30,000. Of the one hundred and fifty millions of interest paid by the people one hundred and fifty-two persons received $45,000,000, or three hundred thousand each. Of thirty-three million people in Great Britain only one million are land-owners, and four-fifths of those mere lot-owners in towns and cities. A thousand persons own nearly one-half of the British Kingdom. Ireland is owned by twelve thousand non-resident proprietors, and three hundred of them own one-third of it. Is there anything in the condition of England to-day that invites us to imitate that policy that has concentrated all her wealth in the hands of her aristocracy? Is there anything in the condition of Ireland that charms us to that policy? From 1841 to 1871 she drove more than eight millions of her subjects away from her dominions to hunt homes in other lands. Her statesmen are to-day devising ways to get rid of the suffering poor, whom they have persecuted and driven to desperation, by heartless, and cruel legislation. Do we desire to reach the same condition? If we do, refund and continue the exactions of this enormous debt, and the system of taxation and currency that stand upon it. If we do not, then let us extinguish this debt as rapidly as we may, and with it will fall corporation control of our currency, and corporation control of our taxation.

Seeing that a national debt is a great national evil; seeing that it is to the interest of the great body of the laboring people of the country that its exactions should be terminated as speedily as possible, the question remains for us to consider can we pay this debt? How can we pay it? Can we pay it speedily? I see no reason why the whole of this debt should not be paid in twenty years. I see no reason for making these bonds run for forty or fifty years, as was originally designed. Why should we make them payable in forty years if we can pay them in a shorter time? Can we? Let us see. The speech of my friend from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, tells us accurately what the revenues of the Government are. He tells us that the Secretary of the Treasury estimates that the revenues of the Government for this year will be $288,000,000, its expenditures $264,000,000. But the gentleman from New York assures us that the Secretary underestimated the revenues by a large amount. The revenues have already, on the 1st day of February, exceeded by $27,000,000 the receipts of last year. In the last two months they were more than they were in the first five. They are still increasing. Hence my friend from New York estimates, and probably underestimates, that by June 30, 1880, the receipts of the Government will be $355,000,000. He further shows you that after all the interest charges and all the ordinary expenses of the Government have been met, $71,000,000 can be applied to the payment of the principal of these bonds. There is no question about that. I think it will be $75,000,000, for it is still increasing. This being the case, if we can apply $71,000,000 on the 30th of next June to the payment of our bonds we can apply the same amount by June 30, 1881. I take that as the time at which all our bonds mature, as most of them do mature in June and July, 1881. Hence I start from that point with my calculation. The 5 and 6 per cent. bonds to be provided for June 30, 1881, will be about $650,000,000. The committee in their bill propose that $200,000,000 of the fives and sixes shall be provided for by a two-ten year bond and that $450,000,000 shall be provided for by a twenty-fourty year bond, all bearing 3½ per cent. interest.

Mr. BUCKNER. Five hundred million dollars.

Mr. MILLS. Five hundred million dollars, provided we do not take into consideration the amount of the principal which I am now supposing will be paid before that time. I take it for granted that our revenues will continue for ten years as high as they are to-day. What is the basis of this estimate? Before the income tax was repealed the revenue derived from the same system of taxation we have today, leaving out incomes and all these other taxes except customs duties and excises, was $350,000,000. The present tariff, with a few unimportant modifications and the present excise law, with the miscellaneous taxes, brought us $350,000,000. Now, can we not get the same amount of revenues for the next ten years from these two sources? Why not? Since 1873 our population has increased four or five millions. Taxation is levied on consumption and consumption is increased in proportion to the increase of population. That is one consideration. Another factor in the problem is that consumption is increased in proportion to the capacity of the people to make purchases to satisfy their wants, and this is in proportion to the money in circulation among them.

I saw a very intelligent monetary article in one of the New York papers some time ago, in which it was stated that the actual circulation of the United States had increased within the last eighteen months $200,000,000. The national banks have increased their circulation, I presume, seventeen or eighteen million dollars.

Mr. BUCKNER. Twenty million dollars.

Mr. MILLS. About $20,000,000. The coinage of silver has increased the circulation; $75,000,000 in gold has come across the Atlantic and been distributed through the country in the purchase of supplies. Now, nine-tenths of our taxes being derived from levies on articles going into consumption, the revenue must increase in proportion to the increase of population and the increased capacity of that population to make purchases to supply their wants. Hence, I take it our revenues will go on increasing gradually for the next eight or ten years, provided we do not have a panic, and I see no occasion for anything of that kind; and if we should, its effect would only be temporary. Now, I will take as the basis of my calculation not the present revenue but something below that. I will make the calculation that our revenue will be $300,000,000, instead of $355,000,000, as it undoubtedly will be the present year. I will estimate that the ordinary expenses of the Government will be $150,000,000, as the Secretary estimates. Thus we would have a surplus of $150,000,000 annually to apply to the interest and principal of the public debt.

Now, taking the annual payment of $150,000,000 on these bonds, how long will it take to pay them? I have a calculation here; and in it I embrace the 4½ per cent. bonds that mature in 1891. That will then give us $900,000,000 of bonds. I provide by my plan that the Government shall sell $300,000,000 of Treasury notes bearing 3½ per cent. interest payable in 1888, 1889, and 1890. That is all I would refund. With the proceeds of the sale of these three hundred millions, not to be sold at less than par and as much above it as we can get—I take it we will without any difficulty sell them at par; that is the basis upon which our bonds are predicated—with the three hundred millions we will extinguish all of the 6 per cent. bonds and enough of the five percents to bring them down to $350,000,000. We will then have our debt $350,000,000 of 5 per cent. bonds, $250,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds, and $300,000,000 of 3½ per cent. Treasury notes. The debt, to be sure, is still $900,000,000. Its interest, however, is changed from $85,063,432 to $73,063,432. That is the interest we are required to keep up on the whole national debt; that is, which we are required to pay for the first year on the whole debt; but of course the interest diminishes as the principal diminishes. We will first commence paying the fives. Seventy-three million sixty-three thousand four hundred and thirty-two dollars being required to meet the interest on the whole national debt for the year ending June 30, 1882, the sum of $76,936,568 may then be applied to the payment of that amount of the fives. On the 30th of June, 1883, after paying the interest on the whole debt remaining, we may apply $80,733,396, the next year $84,822,565, and so on. On the 30th of June, 1886, the fives are all paid, and $75,123,102 of the four-and-a-halves purchased. On the 30th of June, 1888, the four-and-a-halves are all purchased, and $25,159,079 applied to the payment of the three-and-a-half Treasury notes. And thus continuing to apply the surplus of the $150,000,000, after paying interest on the whole debt on the 30th of June, 1891, all the Treasury notes are paid, and the whole debt of $900,000,000 extinguished, with a surplus of over fifty-six millions.

By the plan of the committee only two hundred millions can be paid in the next ten years. But to that it is answered they can purchase them and save the high rate of interest we are paying. If $150,000,000 are annually applied under the bill proposed by the committee, they will have to purchase the whole $900,000,000 at a premium. Under my plan we only purchase the four-and-a-halves due in 1891. Let us see how they compare.

By the committee's bill we pay—

Principal	$900,000,000
Interest	528,000,000
5 per cent. premium	45,000,000
	1,473,000,000

By the plan I propose we will pay—

Principal	900,000,000
Interest	543,000,000
5 per cent. premium on four-and-a-halves	12,500,000
	1,455,500,000

On the score of economy my plan is cheaper by eighteen millions than that of the committee. But that is the smallest objection I have to their bill. If the revenues instead of falling fifty millions should only fall twenty-five per annum for the next ten years from the present figures, then we would pay the debt in 1887. If the revenues should remain as they are to-day for ten years, we will pay the debt in 1886. With the promising prospects before us, is it not an act of folly, if not a crime, to retain this debt for forty years? If Congress, unwisely as I think, shall determine to refund these bonds as the committee propose, what are we going to do with the surplus revenues now in our coffers and continually coming in? Leaving out of the question the payment of any portion of this debt out of money now in the Treasury, the incoming revenues in ten years will pay the $900,000,000. I asked that question of the Secretary of the Treasury, "What are you going to do with this money if you go on refunding these bonds for forty years?" He said he would buy bonds in the market or else decrease taxation. The chairman of the committee said, "That would be a better way," and I said, "And thus perpetuate the debt." He promptly said no, he would apply it to the sinking fund. But if the money is to be applied to the sinking fund, why not pay the bonds without refunding? Why refund and then purchase at a premium? The chairman and the Secretary let the cat out of the wallet when they proposed to reduce taxation; and that undoubtedly is the policy, to reduce internal revenue and retain the debt. It is vain for us to indulge the hope that after we refund these bonds into others running forty years we may then purchase them at a less figure than we can now pay them at their present rate of interest. If these bonds are placed beyond our power to call and pay, the premium will soon rise so high that the Government will find itself cornered. The Secretary told us the other day that the holders were making corners on him now. With the bonds maturing next year, do you think the national banks will stand by with unconcern and see undermined their foundations? Do you think the large bondholders, like Vanderbilt with his thirty millions in bonds, will let you destroy the only safe paying investment for his large wealth? Do you think the manufacturing confederacy will remain neutral, and lose this most effective agency for the retention of high prohibitory tariffs?

No, sir; you will find in a short time that the price of your bonds will be so high that it will cost you more to buy than it would have done to let them remain even at 5 and 6 per cent. interest. I beg this House to understand, and the people to understand, that the moneyed confederacy do not intend this debt shall be paid if it is in their power to prevent it. The first step is to get these bonds beyond the power of the Government to call and pay and get them within their own control. The next step will be to raise the premium and embarrass the Government in every possible way, so that it will cease its efforts to purchase. In the mean time, the representatives of their interests in Congress will tell us it is unwise to pay such prices for the bonds, let the people retain their money, reduce taxation, and give back your surplus revenues. Pass this bill, and another will follow on its heels in quick succession to reduce internal-revenue taxation. Mark you, not the tariff, but internal revenue. It does not lie in the power of forty millions of people to touch that accursed robbery. But when the capitalists, bankers, and bondholders find they must give up the debt or internal taxes, they will give up that which is least advantageous to them. The internal taxes do not affect their interests. It was only retained to make sure the interest when the debt was so large and its interest so great that high tariffs standing on tip-toe did not meet their demand. As soon as it is found that the debt can be retained, its interest paid, the banks secured, and high tariffs preserved, the internal taxes on whisky and tobacco may go.

How feelingly they will talk of the burden of taxation when they come and ask for the repeal of internal revenues. Pass this bill and you will soon pass the other, and all your means of paying the debt will then be gone. Then you will have the debt perpetuated until we are all dead, and the same arguments which are being made here to-day will be made here to the next generation. The same sophistries to which you have listened our children will listen and our grandchildren and our great-grandchildren, and, sir, this debt will go on for two hundred years, as it has in Great Britain, and be greater at the end of that period than it is to-day; and in every neighborhood the poor-house and the prison will stand as monuments of our folly.

Let us to-day resolve that we will hold our taxes as they now stand, and add to it a tax on incomes and apply them as fast as possible to the extinguishment of the debt. Let us imitate the patriotism and wisdom of Pitt, and lay the income tax and make the large wealth of this country contribute to its support. Is there any good reason why it should not? Why should all the burdens of government fall upon the shoulders of the poor? Why should taxation on consumption alone pay all the expenses of supporting this vast fabric of government? Great Britain has had a tax on incomes ever since 1850. Most of the governments of Europe have the same. Why should the immense wealth in this country be exempted? Here is a very inviting field before us, from which it seems to me we might glean a little. In 1866 there were 460,170 persons, who had incomes amounting to $966,358,599. In 1867 the exemption was raised to $1,000, and the number of persons fell to 266,135, and they had incomes $813,968,333. In 1868 there were 276,661 persons, who had incomes amounting to $806,006,476. In 1869 there were 272,843 persons, who had incomes amounting to $819,907,392. In 1870 there were 275,661 persons, who had incomes amounting to $806,006,476.

These were in the main the same persons, and their incomes—their net earnings—for the five years amounted to $4,128,665,195. Ought we not to require this vast wealth to contribute its just share to support the Government?

Mr. MCKENZIE. What was the greatest amount collected as income tax in any one year?

Mr. MILLS. About $72,000,000.

Now, if the tax had been kept on these incomes and on capital invested in manufactures we would not have had a dollar of indebtedness to-day. Let us keep the revenues we have and add to them the income tax and pay the debt as fast as we can. And as fast as we can, let us emancipate our people from the dominion of debt, excessive indirect taxation, and national banks, that are so rapidly concentrating the wealth of the country in the hands of the few and endangering the very existence of free institutions. So great has the aggregation of wealth already become that to-day it threatens to take possession of the Government. We already hear in every direction that we want a stronger government—a government whose frown will awe into silence every breath of complaint—a government whose powerful arm will hold a distressed and persecuted people quiet, make them starve with a smile and expire in decency and order—a government so strong that no indignant public opinion can shake its corrupt and wicked administration.

It is not a government made strong by the powerful support of a moneyed aristocracy that we want; it is not a government made strong by the iron arm and despotic will of a military chieftain that we need; it is not a government so strong in gold and steel that it may reply to all the complaints of its suffering citizens with a blow; but a government that feels its greatest strength when it reposes on the popular will and draws all its support from the filial affection of the citizen. [Applause.] That government whose statesmen diligently seek the public good as the highest aim of their ambition will never find an hour so dire that it must needs covet some other strength to steady and support it as it reels and totters in the throes of popular convulsion. It is not a strong government but a just government that we want. Let us give the people wise and beneficent laws; let comforts—the just reward of labor—diffuse themselves through all the land, and their magic spell will secure the domestic tranquillity and repel the enemy from the gates when gold, like a recreant, flies the field. Let us as faithful Representatives so discharge the high trusts committed to us that the Republic will suffer no detriment at our hands; that the land shall increase in wealth, in prosperity, and in a contented and numerous people. Let us leave open to them every avenue to their individual improvement and remove every impediment in the path of their progress upward and onward. Let us secure to them the enjoyment of every reward that labor offers as an inducement to toil. Then the Government will feel its greatest strength as it confidently leans for support upon all the arms and heads and hearts of its people. [Applause.]

Mr. BARBER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the courtesy of the committee for a moment. As I understand the remarks of the gentleman from Texas he sought to impress us with the idea that, during the Napoleonic war, Pitt did not increase the national debt of England. Now I wish to read a brief extract bearing upon this point, from the lips of Charles James Fox by Lord John Russell. He writes:

Yet in this supposed inviolability of the sinking fund, working at compound interest, consisted the whole merit and originality of Mr. Pitt's measure. As to the boast that this measure would prevent the debt ever rising, during war, to the height it had previously done, facts have converted these rosy tints of eloquence into the somber colors of national incumbrance. The American war left this country charged with a debt of two hundred and fifty millions; Mr. Pitt's French war left it indebted to the amount of eight hundred millions. Some advantage was derived by stock-jobbers from the weekly purchases of the commissioners of the national debt, but the nation required every year larger loans and had to pay an additional bonus to the lenders.

Mr. MILLS. In response to that I will read what Mr. Gladstone says on the same subject, in his speech on the income tax in April, 1853. Mr. Gladstone says:

Now, every one of us is aware of the enormous weight and enormous mischief that have been entailed upon this country by the accumulation of our debt; but it is not too much to say that it is demonstrated by the figures that our debt need not at this moment have existed if there had been resolution enough to submit to the income tax at an earlier period. This test of my assertion I think you will admit is a fair one: I begin by putting together the whole charge of government and war, together with so much of the national debt as had accrued before 1793, so as to make (if I may so express myself) a fair start from 1793. The charge of government and war, together with the charge of debt incurred before 1793, amounted, on the average of the six years down to 1798, to £36,030,000 a year; the revenue of that period, with all the additional taxes that were laid on, amounted to £20,626,000 a year. There was, therefore, an annual excess of charge above revenue—charge for government, for war, and for debt contracted before 1793, but not including the charge of debt contracted since 1793—of no less than £15,404,000.

Now the scene shifts. In 1798 Mr. Pitt just initiates the income tax, and immediately a change begins. In the four years, from 1799 to 1802, the charge for the same items that I have mentioned, which had been £36,000,000, rose to £47,413,000 a year; but the revenue rose to £33,734,000 a year, and the excess for those four years was diminished by nearly £2,000,000 a year; instead of an annual excess of £15,404,000 over revenue, it was £13,689,000. But next look to the operation of the tax, both direct and collateral, from 1806 to 1815, during the very time when our exertions were greatest and our charges were heaviest. The average annual expenses of war and government, from 1806 to 1815, together with the charge upon the debt contracted before 1793, were £65,794,000; but you had your income tax in its full force, with your whole financial system invigorated by its effects, and the revenue of the country now amounted to £63,790,000; while the deficiency in actual hard money, which during the war represented something like double the amount in debt, owing to the rate at which you borrowed, instead of being £15,404,000 a year, as it was in the first period, or £13,689,000 a year, as it was in the second period, was only £2,004,000 a year, from 1806 to 1815.

Such was the power of the income tax. I have said there was a deficiency annually of £2,004,000, but it is fair for you to recollect, and it is necessary in order fully to present to you the fact I want to place in clear view, that out of the $65,794,000 of charge which I have mentioned, about $9,500,000 were due for charge of debt contracted before 1793; so that if you compare the actual expense of government, including the whole expense of war from 1806 to 1815 with your revenue when you had the income tax, it stands thus before you: that you actually raised $7,000,000 a year during that period more than the charge of government, and the charge of a gigantic war to boot. That I must say is to my mind a most remarkable fact.

[During Mr. MILLS's speech the following occurred:

Mr. MILLS. I see that my time is going fast, and I would like the consent of the House for a short extension of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. MILLS. I want to discuss this bill particularly, and I ask the House to give me a little more time. My friend from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] who will follow me, can have all the time that he wants.

Mr. LOWE. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended.

Mr. DUNNELL. Extended indefinitely?

Mr. MILLS. I will want but fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. LOWE. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended twenty minutes.

There was no objection.]

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report in December last, called the attention of Congress to the fact that certain bonds of the Government would become payable upon the demand of the holders, December 31, 1880, and that certain other bonds would be redeemable at different dates in 1881. Those which are so payable in 1880 amount to $18,415,000. The Secretary said that these bonds, the loan of February 8, 1861, maturing December 31, 1880, can probably be provided for from the surplus revenues. Bonds to the amount of $182,605,550, authorized by acts of July 17 and August 5, 1861, are redeemable June 30, 1881, and bonds to the amount of $71,787,000, authorized by act of March 3, 1863, are redeemable June 30, 1881. Also, bonds to the amount of $823,800, authorized by act of March 2, 1861, are redeemable July 1, 1881. All the above bonds amount in the aggregate to $273,631,350, and bear an interest of 6 per cent.

In addition to the foregoing securities, there will be redeemable May 1, 1881, 5 per cent. bonds to the amount of $508,440,350. These last were authorized by acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871. The total of these bonds, being all the 6 and 5 per cent. bonds of the Government now unpaid, is $782,071,700. Taking from this sum the $18,415,000 which are to be provided for from the surplus revenues, there remain $763,656,700 to be taken care of, either by payment in whole or in part or some process of refunding.

The Committee on Ways and Means have been charged with the duty of preparing for the consideration of the House a bill providing for refunding these maturing bonds. Every patriot in the country would rejoice if we had the money with which to redeem these obligations of the Government and so relieve the people from their present taxation. As this beneficent result cannot now be attained, it certainly will be deemed wise to refund them on the most favorable terms possible, or such a portion of them as cannot be met by the surplus revenues of the Government prior to the dates when the bonds are redeemable. If these bonds could be paid within two, three, or even four years by the revenues, it would be far better to continue to pay the 6 and 5 per cent. interest on them than refund for a long time at 4 or 3½ per cent. It is unreasonable, however, to suppose that even one-half of this amount could be paid in the longest time named.

Before alluding to the bill under consideration it may be proper, in this place, to give the suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in his last report. He said:

It is respectfully suggested that authority be given at the present session of Congress to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, 4 per cent. bonds of the description set forth in the said act of July 14, 1870, and refunding certificates of the description set forth in the act of February 26, 1879, with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions, except as hereinafter stated, to the extent necessary to redeem the bonds falling due on or before July 1, 1881, above described, and to use the proceeds for that purpose.

It is hoped that the advancing credit of the country will enable the Secretary to sell such bonds and certificates at a premium, but it seems better to maintain the general conditions of the 4 per cent. bonds rather than to undertake to sell a bond at lower interest. The 4 per cent. consol is now universally known. The rate of interest is as low as will generally maintain the bond at par, and the premium will measure its advance above par at favorable periods. The certificates should bear the same rate and be sold on the same terms as the bonds. It is important that the authority granted should include the power to refund, from the passage of the act at the present session, and to prepay the excess of interest on the bond to be refunded prior to its maturity. The present is believed to be an exceptionally favorable time for such refunding.

These suggestions are:

First. That the bonds and certificates to be issued are to be four percents.

Second. That the Secretary be authorized to sell the bonds and certificates and with the proceeds purchase the maturing bonds or pay them at maturity.

The Secretary, in his conference with the Committee on Ways and Means, modified the second suggestion above, drawn from his annual report, for he said in reference to the sale of bonds for money:

It will not be wise for us to sell them for the money with the uncertainty as to our being able to use that money in buying an equal amount of outstanding bonds not yet matured; and if you were to authorize that, we should necessarily have to increase the public debt. We might not be able to use the money.

The committee after mature deliberation decided to report the bill now under discussion. It provides:

First. That the Secretary of the Treasury may issue bonds to the amount of $500,000,000, which shall bear interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after twenty years, and payable fifty years from date of issue.

Second. That he may also issue notes in the amount of $200,000,000, bearing interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after two years, and payable in ten years from the date of issue; but not more than $40,000,000 of said notes shall be redeemed in any one fiscal year.

Third. That he may issue certificates of deposit to an amount not exceeding $50,000,000, fixing the rate of interest to be allowed thereon at 3½ per cent. per annum for one year, after which interest shall cease; and the said certificates shall be convertible at the option of the holder, when presented in sums of $50 or multiples thereof, into the coupon or registered bonds authorized by this act.

By these three provisions, the Secretary may issue bonds and certificates to the amount of seven hundred and fifty millions. The bonds, as already stated, maturing in 1880 and 1881 amount to $782,071,700, and for the conversion of which into securities bearing a lower rate of interest, this bill is now before us. The annual interest now paid upon the $782,071,700 is $41,839,898. The annual interest which these new bonds will call for, will be $26,250,000. The annual interest which will be saved by the operation of this bill will be $15,589,898. Assuming that the surplus revenues will wholly absorb the difference between the $782,071,700 of the bonds to be met and the $750,000,000 herein provided for, the annual interest charge after this exchange of the 3½ per cent. bonds and certificates for the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds has been consummated will be but $68,183,881 over against the annual interest charge August 31, 1865, of $150,977,617.

Here will be a reduction in the annual interest charge since September 1, 1865, of $82,792,736. These figures will find a place in our financial statements, if this bill shall pass and be executed. The interest-bearing debt will be $1,765,577,000, instead of $2,381,530,294 as it was August 31, 1865. The thoughtful patriot will rejoice over this result.

A national debt is not a blessing. To a republican government it is an abiding curse. Indeed it is a curse to any government. No party or administration, as I believe, will have an indorsement of the American people which does not seek some annual reduction in this debt. This reduction, however, must not come, except in pursuance of policies and methods absolutely honest.

We are now, as a government, reaping a rich reward, because its Administrations since the war have kept to fulfillment every letter in our financial pledges.

I here insert a table to sustain some of my foregoing statements:

Year.	Total interest-bearing debt.	Annual interest charge.

The question which the Committee on Ways and Means first met was, whether the bonds contemplated in this bill could be exchanged for the bonds to be taken up if they were to be 3½ per cent. As the bill provides for an adjustment of the difference in interest from the time of the offered exchange and maturity, the simple question was whether the bonds of the United States to the amount of five hundred millions could be sold at par bearing 3½ per cent. interest, redeemable after twenty years and payable after forty. The readiness with which the 4 per cent. bonds were sold; the eagerness with which the people sought the new 4 per cent. certificates of deposit; the premium at which the four percents sold; the premium at which they are now quoted; the fact that these bonds are the only ones which the United States can possibly put upon the market before 1891, and not then unless a war intervene; the evident existence in the country of large amounts of trust funds, which, as experience has shown, seek permanent and safe investment; the many assurances which bankers and others competent to judge gave, brought the committee to the opinion that no higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent. need be paid.

It is not certain, I admit, that these securities at the rate of interest fixed can be used as we propose, nor was it certain that the 4 per cent. bonds could be sold. More or as much uncertainty was felt then as now. Certainly the four percents did not absorb all the trust funds in the country, as was apparent when the last sales were made. I entertain the opinion that when Congress has passed this bill, the four percents will reach a premium of 9 per cent. at least, and then investors can do better by seeking the bonds which this bill will provide than any other class of our national securities. The bonds to be issued are to be offered in exchange for the five and six percents till their maturity, and if the exchange is not completed prior to the maturity of the old bonds, then the new bonds are to be sold and the proceeds used in the purchase of the old bonds not exchanged.

Aside from moneys which may be called trust funds, there are large amounts of money in the country which the owners thereof do not care to invest in active business enterprises. They are in many instances persons who, retiring from business, seek investments which shall be free from needed supervision and consequent anxiety. Such parties prefer a bond of the Government, though it bear a low rate of interest, to any other security. At no time in our national history has our credit been so good as now. Fidelity to pledges, made during and since the war, has largely contributed to this result. This credit was caused in part by a return to specie payments. Resumption not only was a fulfillment of money promises made during the war, but it made the large volume of paper money in circulation equivalent in commercial value to the coin of the Constitution. Resumption, whether begun too soon or too late, whether reached by precisely the best methods or not, could not fail to strengthen our national credit, and will not now, while sustained, fail to bring forward for permanent and safe investment much money which, if it has not been hoarded, has been employed in transactions but poorly remunerative and so employed till the full credit of the Government was reached.

While the returning prosperity in business may keep in active circulation and venture the great bulk of the acquired wealth of the people, yet no inconsiderable fraction of this wealth will withdraw from hazards which prosperity always begets and seek security. In the midst of the wildest speculations, there are a few at least who then instinctively retire from business, and all the more readily inquire for a place where they may safely lodge their money. We should not forget that the value of the annual productions of all the industries of the United States is so large that the ability to invest in such securities as this bill contemplates, is much greater than we might suppose.

A full year will be given in which the bonds provided for in this bill are to be offered in exchange for the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds. These bonds are not to be sold for money till after the maturity of the bonds to be taken up. If this exchange cannot be effected by a 3½ per cent. bond, it will be in time when Congress meets in December next to authorize a 4 per cent. bond. Haste is not needed; nor can it be urged except on the assumption that the times are more favorable now than they will be next year.

The questions, Mr. Chairman, which this bill presents are not many, and are very simple. We have bonds maturing in 1880 and 1881, bearing 5 and 6 per cent. interest. Shall they remain to be reduced from year to year by the surplus revenues, which the Secretary of the Treasury judges will be $50,000,000 each year if there be no unlooked-for changes and no marked modifications in the revenue laws of the country, or shall these bonds be refunded with 3½ per cent. bonds, and the Government then use the $50,000,000 in the purchase of the outstanding 4½ per cent. bonds, which are redeemable September 1, 1891, and are in amount $250,000,000? I do not hesitate to declare my opinion that the latter course is the preferable one. The public-debt statement for February, made March 1, confirms me in this opinion. I will here make it a part of my remarks. The reduction in the public debt for the month of February, as will be seen by the official statement, was over $5,500,000, notwithstanding the fact that over $6,000,000 were paid out during the month on account of pensions. The total revenues during the month were larger than those ever received before during the month of February under the present revenue laws. The receipts from customs during the month amounted to $16,800,000, while in the corresponding month of 1879 they amounted to only $10,800,000. The receipts from internal revenues last month were over $8,750,000 while in February, 1879, they amounted to more than $1,000,000 less.

At no time since the foundation of the Government has it been free from some debt. The national debt January 1, 1791, was $75,463,476. This had a very gradual reduction, though increasing some years, till January 1, 1812, when it was $45,209,737. From this point it increased till January 1, 1816, when it was $127,334,933. The revolutionary war was the chief cause of the original debt, and the war of 1812 with Great Britain was the cause of the increase. From 1816 it decreased till 1836, when it was but $37,513. From this time it increased till January 1, 1843, when it became $20,601,226; July 1, 1843, it was $32,742,922; July 1, 1851, it amounted to $68,304,796. This increase is chargeable to the Mexican war. This debt was annually lessened till 1857, when it was $28,699,831, and from this year it was annually increased till July 1, 1861, when it was $76,455,239. As no part of this increase can be charged to the war of the rebellion, there was a larger increase of the national debt from 1857 to 1861 than during any similar period of peace since the foundation of the Government. It is no wonder that the war of 1812 and the Mexican war increased the public debt, and the wonder is that they did not make larger increases. History does concede that our financial affairs were conducted with marked ability during these two wars. It remains to be seen what reasons history will give for the large increase of the public debt during the administration of President Buchanan. From July 1, 1861, to July 1, 1865, the debt increased from $76,455,239 to $2,756,431,571. It is not necessary to say that this enormous debt was that part of the money expenditure made to preserve the Union and which remained unpaid when the rebellion was brought to an end. From the close of the war in 1865 to this hour the Government has been exerting all her energies so to manage and reduce this large debt that the public credit might be fully restored; that business might be brought back to normal channels and prosperity; that taxation might be reduced to the minimum of burden, and that the promissory notes of the Government made necessary by the exigencies of war, and for that reason alone declared constitutional, might become, as they now have, honest representatives of the promised gold and silver of the Constitution.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that the Government during this period has achieved great financial success. The interest-bearing debt has been reduced from $2,381,530,294 to $1,770,212,850, or $611,317,444. If we add to this the aggregate amount of interest-money paid since July 1, 1865, which has amounted to $1,708,595,985, we shall have $2,319,913,429 as the sum total paid on the debt and interest on the debt. When we consider that we have paid $1,708,595,985 of interest, while we have reduced the principal but $611,317,444, we shall see no beauty in a national debt, but find in it the certain elements of a grievous burden. Should we add to the $2,319,913,429—the aggregate debt reduction and interest paid—the net ordinary expenditures of the Government for the same period, which have been $3,299,921,125, aside from the interest on the public debt, we have $5,619,834,654 as the sum total of our expenditures during these fifteen years. These figures should warn us against policies tending to perpetuate this vast burden. They should rather impel us to measures calculated annually to reduce the burden and end it within the least possible period of time. To the consummation of this great good every party and every section should struggle.

Though the bonded debt has had a reasonable reduction, yet the reduction in the annual interest charge has been very great. As already stated, it has fallen from $150,977,697 to $83,773,778 on July 1, 1879, and if this bill should pass and go into full execution the annual interest charge will be but $68,183,881. This fact in our financial situation is full of promise; it is a just cause of congratulation; and it has, in part, been secured by refunding operations. The secured credit of the Government, its honesty, its fidelity to promises made during and since the war, have conspired to this grand result. The people have sustained these measures and policies. They will continue to do so, no matter how loudly the few may complain and however severely the few may criticize. The people love good results. They care less about methods, provided they are honest, and nothing about the theories of pretenders in finance.

The Government has a small debt besides the bonded debt. I will not stop to enumerate the items, but here insert the following table, which will show the aggregate debt each year since 1865, interest-bearing and non-interest-bearing, less cash in the Treasury:

The cash in the Treasury July 1, 1879, was $249,080,167. It has been stated in this debate that the bonded debt increased in 1878 about $83,000,000 over the debt in 1877. That is true; but it is very proper to state the reasons. Bonds to this amount were issued for resumption purposes. This issue did increase the bonded debt, but the money received for the bonds was put into the Treasury, and there remains. Whether all this cash should now be kept in the Treasury to give security to resumption is not a question which this bill suggests or one which I deem it necessary to consider. It is, however, my opinion that some of this cash could be used in payment of a portion of the maturing bonds for which this bill makes provision and in no manner endanger resumption. How much of it could be so used, I am not prepared to say. Not enough of it should be removed to put in the least jeopardy the end for which it was put there. The business prosperity of the country which now makes glad every portion of it, should not have the least check. The slightest shadow of danger in this direction would work an injury which five times the cash in the Treasury could not mend.

Let me here ask attention to the fifth section of the bill under consideration. It provides that from and after the 1st day of July, 1880, the $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. bonds, authorized by the first section of the bill shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national-bank circulation. The amount of bonds on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States to secure the circulation of national banks at the close of business March 9, 1880, was \$362,843,050. Of this, \$132,518,000 are four percents, payable in 1907, and \$37,316,950 in four-and-a-half percents, payable in 1891. The balance consists of five and six percents. For the redemption of these and others of like denomination, this bill is now before us. When the three-and-a-half percents contemplated by this bill shall take the place of the five and six percents now held by the banks, the annual interest on the bonds which will then be held by the banks, if remaining the same in amount, will be \$12,735,266.

The national banks in 1871 paid national and State taxes to the amount of $18,509,973, and in 1877, $15,731,877. For the last two years they have paid not less than in 1877. These figures disclose the interesting fact that while these bonds held by the national banks give complete security for every dollar issued by the banks, the banks themselves actually pay out in the shape of taxes an amount larger than the interest on the bonds. When we consider this fact, we shall see the extreme folly of withdrawing the national-bank notes which are taxable, and putting in their place Treasury notes which are not taxable. This folly will appear all the more supreme when we reflect that the Government must pay the interest on all its outstanding bonds, whether held by the banks or by private parties.

The history of the loans of the United States from 1776 is instructive as well as interesting. The loans authorized by the Continental Congress amounted to \$49,000,000, but the amount received was only \$8,536,517. The rate of interest was 5 per cent. and in one instance 4 per cent. The securities sold at par. The loans negotiated in Holland from 1790 to 1794 were 5 per cent., and the securities sold at an average of ninety-six cents. During the next five years other small 6 per cent. loans were effected at par. In 1795 a $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. loan was negotiated at par; in 1800 an 8 per cent. loan was authorized, the notes selling at a very small premium. The securities which were issued during the next twelve years were 6 per cent., and sold at par. Those negotiated in 1814 were 6 per cent., and sold at eighty cents. The first bonds of the Government which were sold for more than one cent premium were authorized in 1848, bearing 6 per cent. interest, payable quarterly or semi-annually. The bonds sold at a premium of three and one-half cents. Those issued between 1848 and 1861 were generally 6 per cent., selling at par. The securities issued by the Government up to 1861 were largely denominated Treasury notes, stocks, certificates, and stock certificates. The aggregate amount received on all loans from 1776 to 1861 was but \$509,074,402. If we consider that the revolutionary war, the Indian wars, the war of 1812, and the Mexican war were all carried on during this period, we shall wonder at the inexpensiveness of the earlier governmental operations. The fathers were economical, and when a debt was incurred they made haste to reduce it. They had no arguments in favor of a perpetual national debt. They were known to the world as opposed to such a policy. We have not departed from their lessons, and I trust we never shall.

When the war of the rebellion was ended, the Government at once commenced the reduction of the debt which it had been compelled to create. Its achievements I have already stated. The reduction has gone on from year to year. The people will not forget it, and will not forgive the party in power which fails to continue the reduction.

If the bill before us becomes a law and the bonds can be disposed of, the bonded debt of the Government will be as follows: \$250,000,000 of four-and-one-half percents, redeemable September 1, 1891; \$740,845,950 four percents, redeemable July 1, 1907; \$500,000,000 three-and-one-half percents, redeemable in 1900; and \$200,000,000 of Treasury notes, $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., redeemable in two years and payable in ten; and \$50,000,000 of certificates of deposit. These five great classes of bonds will constitute our debt. The interest upon these, as already stated, will be \$68,183,881, while the interest upon the bonded debt at the close of the war was \$150,977,617.

Mr. Chairman, thus far in what I have said I have spoken from no partisan stand-point. I did not suppose the discussion on this bill would be partisan in its character. I could not anticipate any reason why it should take that turn. It is a simple business proposition for the Government of the United States to entertain. The discussion of this question, legitimately conducted, does not go back of the present hour. It has no business with anything except the simple, naked proposition whether or not we shall make provision for these maturing bonds; and, if we are to make provision for them, how, or in what manner, at what rate of interest, and for how long a time. If we are to make no provision for them, as the eloquent gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FELTON] suggests, then it is for us to canvass carefully, if we legislate wisely, the revenues we are to have or how much money we shall have with which to take care of these maturing bonds.

I have said in the remarks which I have already made that there is no party in this country that asks for the perpetuation of the public debt. The policy of the party to which I belong, has been against it from the time that it took hold of the Government. Not a session has been held since the close of the war, in which a reduction of the national debt has not been in contemplation. I am glad that the democratic side of the House favors the reduction of the national debt. I am heartily glad of it. Only I say, Mr. Chairman, let that reduction be made by honest methods.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] says he takes it for granted that during the next ten years we shall have such and such revenues. Is it wise to legislate on mere assumptions? Is it wise for me to give a vote to-day on an assumption that for ten years to come the revenues are to be what they are to-day? Certainly not. The views of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] do not harmonize with that line of argument. We are to meet the question like business men. Shall we let these bonds run on at 6 and 5 per cent. and take the chances of reducing the volume or paying them in full, or shall we put them into bonds bearing a lower rate of interest? Suppose we have sixty-one millions of surplus revenues, as the gentleman from Texas says; that we have refunded these bonds; it will not deny us the privilege of using those sixty-one millions in the purchase of outstanding $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. bonds. We can use every dollar of surplus revenues in the reduction of our bonded debt just as well if this quantity now under contemplation be put into three-and-a-half percents as though we allowed that portion to run on at 5 and 6 per cent.

The gentleman from Texas has talked about the debt of Great Britain. There is no advocate here of British policy on this floor. There is no man inside of the republican party that has ever declared a national debt a national blessing. There is nothing in our history that should educate the people of this generation into a national-debt theory. Our forefathers were wonderful men. No sooner had the revolutionary war closed than they commenced the reduction of their debt; and no matter what administration has been in power, the reduction of the existing debt has been one of our crowning national virtues. It has entered into our national history, and England to-day in her best journals and in the strongest language commends to the world the financial history and the financial record of the United States of America. The republican party has no record in conflict with our national history. It has proudly presented its financial record to the people and they have indorsed it. We do not avoid the fullest investigation; we are for an honest administration of the Government and the annual reduction of the national debt.

We have had, Mr. Chairman, all along in our national history able men at the head of the Treasury—Hamilton and Gallatin and Rush—

Mr. HAWLEY. Wolcott, of Connecticut.

Mr. DUNNELL. And Walker, who managed our finances during the Mexican war with consummate ability; and since him Guthrie and Chase. History always sets things right. I am not called upon to defend any man. But when the history of the present times shall be written by a thoughtful posterity, the name of John Sherman will be found among the names of these great Secretaries of the Treasury.

I say this not as a republican, for I do not think it is necessary to discuss the question from that stand-point. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has referred to the English debt. I agree with him that the English debt has borne down and is bearing down the English people. We want no such burden upon the energies of the American people. But the gentleman made one singular statement, that it is the business of governments in time of peace to hoard money for the time of war.

Mr. MILLS. No, sir. I said ancient governments did it, and I condemn it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I did not hear the condemnation come in.

Mr. MILLS. I said it was wrong and reprehensible, but that it was better than the funding system.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe this Republic will ever adopt the policy of hoarding money in the time of peace for a time of war.

Mr. MILLS. And it ought not.

Mr. DUNNELL. War ought not to enter into our governmental policy. When war comes, where, Mr. Chairman, should be our strength in this country?

Mr. WEAVER. In the greenback.

Mr. DUNNELL. Where is our strength to-day in the world? It is in our grand credit. It is in our credit, Mr. Chairman, which to us is not only a pillar of strength but a source of great national glory. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEAVER] says: "In the greenback." Why was there strength in the greenback? Because it was the promise of a government which was entitled to public credit, because it was issued for the public defense and for that end authorized by the Constitution, and declared constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States.

But a word more and I will close. I admired the eloquent language of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. FELTON,] language that did his heart and head much credit. He says: Let us stand by the national debt to its full payment—let us stand by all the pledges of the Government in letter and spirit. He pleads for the extinction of this debt. So do I. He follows one line in reaching the grand result, and I follow another. Now, if I were certain, Mr. Chairman, that our revenues would enable us to take care of these maturing bonds within two, three, or four years, I would let them stand unrefunded and take care of them by degrees. But it is demonstrable that it is better to refund these bonds at a 3½ per cent. rate, and then use the fifty millions which the Secretary thinks we may have in decreasing the funded debt, in the purchase of other outstanding bonds; that we shall use the money to better account after the refunding processes have been entered into, than to let these bonds remain at their present high rate of interest and attempt their extinction by the surplus revenues.

I have said that I thought some of the cash in the Treasury might be used; I do not know whether it could or not. It is very easy to make declarations here and to give opinions. I cannot say just what percentage of the present volume of money in the Treasury is needed to keep resumption safe. The gentleman from New York would not hazard resumption in the slightest degree. Yet that matter, it was agreed in the committee, should come before the House in a separate bill. Therefore I have said that resumption was not necessarily connected with or involved in a legitimate discussion of this bill.

I will not longer occupy the time, further than to say that in my opinion we have great reason, as the representatives of the people, to congratulate them upon the present financial outlook. We have a restored credit; we have returning prosperity; we have our debt in such a shape that we can grapple it and handle it. The burden by way of annual taxation has been so much reduced that the debt has largely ceased to be the burden which it was soon after the war.

I believe that in legislation it is better to cling to the existing condition of things than to legislate under anticipated adverse conditions. The gentleman from Texas is full of fear. Foreboding has taken possession of him. He is considering with a great deal of anxiety the posterities that are to follow him. If we can pay $50,000,000 annually upon our national debt, as he says we can, the gentleman from Texas, if he lives to the ordinary period of human life, will see this debt completely wiped out. I hope and expect to live to see the consummation of the grand result. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] says it will be done in fifteen years or less. If our surplus revenues in the years immediately to come shall be $50,000,000 with a Congress in session each year to tell the Secretary what to do with those funds, how are we to be damaged because of those surplus revenues? We can order him to dispose of them in the purchase of outstanding bonds. We run no risk by this legislation. We do not put off a day the final extinguishment of the national debt. We shall save $15,000,000 a year in interest money if this bill passes and is put into successful operation. Adding this saving to the $50,000,000 which the gentleman says we shall have, we have $65,000,000. Let that $65,000,000 do its work year by year, and the gentleman from Texas may think less of posterity and look forward to the day when he can raise his voice in a grand acclaim, in a national thanksgiving that the great debt which the salvation of the Union made necessary has been extinguished by the generation that saw it created.

Mr. LADD. Mr. Chairman, that portion of the interest-bearing debt of the United States redeemable in 1881 it is proposed by this bill to refund in part in forty years, at the rate of 3½ per cent. interest, free from all taxation.

This proposition, if the refunding of more bonds is deemed necessary, has advantages, could we be assured it would be honestly carried out by those in power, as it will save nearly 2 per cent. on seven hundred and sixty-three millions maturing on which we now pay an average interest of 5.33 per cent.

The distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] has very clearly presented the proposition to the committee. For his able speech on this bill he deserves the thanks of the whole country, and while I differ with him as to the expediency of refunding any more of our maturing debt I can appreciate his learned efforts in behalf of economy. But he fails to impress me with the importance of refunding the maturing debt when it is clearly within the power of the Treasury to pay the whole amount, without disturbing the relations of debtor and creditor, by using present and anticipating, without much expense, future receipts, and thereby saving a large part of the interest to be paid and the tempting influence to fortune making by those in power. According to his showing a 3½ per cent. bond can be disposed of at par. Of this fact there can be no question. Admitting the shameful abuse of the power heretofore given to the present Secretary of the Treasury for refunding, which has cost the country (as estimated by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means) the enormous sum of $115,500 more than it should have cost, I regret to say he has failed to represent that the whole system of refunding is obnoxious to the charge of fraud, corruption, and money-making by the ring in power and highly dangerous to our institutions. I believe the refunding of our maturing bonds means a continuance of our present expensive banking system with all its objectionable surroundings.

The bill provides as follows:

SEC. 5. From and after the 1st day of July, 1880, the 3½ per cent. bonds authorized by the first section of this act shall be the only bonds receivable as security for national bank circulation.

The bondholder and bank owner are copartners. They are one concern. They represent one house. They pledge their bonds for currency or they withdraw them as the ebb and flow of the tide of self-interest may dictate. I am opposed to the whole system, for I believe that all our financial troubles had their origin in the large bonded debt, which is wielded by this unholy copartnership exclusively for the benefit of the different copartners. Here let me say no party is responsible for my views; neither do I believe any party can live in this country on past recollections, any more than a starving family can on a book of heraldry. I propose a change. I am for a reform in reducing our bonded debt, believing it is now in our power so to do in a manner safe to all by utilizing our present revenue and anticipating that that is to come into the Treasury.

The bonds that it is now proposed to refund, most of them, have been refunded once before, the operation of which contributed in producing the great financial crash of 1873.

Freighted in this bonded ship we find—

First. The national banks striving for the exclusive right to issue all the currency.

Second. The non-taxable bondholder striving to continue himself and his posterity as dead-heads.

Third. The opponents of silver striving for an exclusive gold currency, in order to appreciate their money or that that can demand gold.

Fourth. The friend of an expensive government. In this all the others can heartily combine, as they pay but a nominal tax.

All of these interests are represented by honorable men, men of wealth, who are clever fellows and highly respectable; socially, perhaps, our superiors. But can we consistently listen to their appeals when so much want and suffering exists at home which calls upon our manhood for the maintenance of equal legislation?

Mr. Chairman, I propose in the remarks I make on this bill, if in order, to speak of the various interests which are involved, all of which affect the people whom I have the honor to represent.

If it is manifestly for the interest of the bondholder to continue the class legislation which has so unjustly discriminated against the industrial classes, it is equally our interest, now that it is in our power, to pay our maturing debt as speedily as possible, and thereby force before it is too late a change in legislation in the interest of economy and industry, which can only be done by keeping the Treasury reasonably short by ignoring all refunding schemes.

We who advocate a change in the interest of the people must not be discouraged in our efforts by the magnitude of the questions involved nor the power and influence brought to oppose our efforts. We must bear in mind a mighty force is entrenched behind those in power, with instrumentalities at hand never before trusted to humanity. Years of class legislation, enacted under the garb of patriotism, can only be met and changed by the combined influence of all now opposed to the republican party. Differences must be buried for the attainment of the one great object—the saving of the Republic.

To be sure our efforts for material progress and reform are now supported by many active minds of a large class of honest thinkers of all parties, but, unfortunately, not all working in harmony. Those who worship the financial theories of the past, and those who with larger hope think mankind should increase the material called money to correspond with the increased production consequent upon the introduction of machinery, may have many a hard battle to fight before they can work in harmony together.

The patriot now is he who by conciliation can bring most laborers into the field now ripe for the harvest. Let me admonish all who desire a change in the interest of the people not to be captious as to what tools the volunteer in this cause brings to the work. The most powerful motor that actuates mankind is enlightened selfishness, and if this is cultivated in the future by the producers as zealously as by the bankers in the past a speedy change is inevitable. Those who have rapidly acquired fortunes by the class legislation of the past twenty years have, quite naturally perhaps, conceived the idea that the Government should be conducted by and in the interest of wealth. But they may also have acquired too great confidence in their ability to maintain our Government as a republic with the present tendency toward centralization. Those who think that prosperity consists in an unjust and unequal distribution of property by class legislation, which has developed into individual extravagance and display of wealth, must be brought to their senses by the producing classes assuming the charge of future legislation.

The country now calls for a halt in such legislation; it calls for a scrutiny into the causes that have produced the business wrecks which have occurred in all leading industries from the Saint John's to the Rio Grande, from the Atlantic to the Pacific; wrecks of business industries, business men, and all those high notions of political integrity which have made us all we are as a nation. No temporary alleviation caused by short crops in Europe can divert the American mind from the producing causes of our unparalleled sufferings, soon to return if the causes that have produced them in the past be not removed. Let us look at the spectacle that such legislation presents. On the one side the unplesant picture of wealth easily obtained developing into regal expenditures, follies, and wickedness. On the other, distress, poverty, and ruin, starvation, suicide, broken constitutions, and broken hopes, to say nothing of crimes and all the heart-rending scenes of suffering consequent thereupon. While the effect, unhappily still continuing, of our past legislation has unquestionably been to increase the wealth and power of the rich and make the laborer still poorer and more dependent, the feature that ought to excite most apprehension and alarm for the safety of our institutions is that the middling classes, the embodiment of enduring qualities, the class that so conspicuously controlled the earlier administrations, are fast disappearing and giving place to extremes of wealth and cringing poverty.

I call your attention to the statistics of failures in the United States for the years 1874, 1875, 1876, 1877, 1878, and nine months of 1879. Number of failures, 47,332; amount of failures, $1,053,525,147, amounting to more than half our public debt.

My limited time will not permit me to allude to the alarming increase of insanity, pauperism, and crime, which will be shown by the census soon to be taken, and which can be attributed to faulty legislation. I will, however, quote from one of our able editors a statement made the latter part of 1878 as to the condition of Maine in this regard:

The change that has taken place in the moral condition of our people during the last eighteen years is no less striking and alarming than that which has been wrought in their physical and material condition. Eighteen years ago there were 153,000 scholars in our public schools. Last year there were but 130,000. In 1860 there were but 42 criminals sentenced to our State prison. Last year there were 83 criminals sentenced to the State prison. In 1860 there were but 40 criminals sentenced to our county jails. Last year 164 were so sentenced. In 1860 there were but 208 patients in our insane asylum. Last year there were 416. In 1860 there were less than 500 indictments for crime by the grand juries of the State. Last year there was the enormous number of 3,261 indictments found by the grand juries of Maine against her citizens. What a record! One in forty of all our voters indicted as criminals in our courts! Look to our own city. In 1860 there were but 824 paupers in Bangor, supported at an expense of less than $7,000. Last year 1,685, supported at an expense of over $26,000. One in eleven of our entire population recorded on our pauper list!

Real estate, depressed from causes of which I shall speak hereafter, and by an exorbitant taxation consequent upon relieving the bondholder from public burdens or making him a dead-head in our financial estimates, has declined in value from 40 to 60 per cent., and in some localities has become entirely worthless; and the condition is not improving except in those localities where wealth accumulates so rapidly as to require a larger area to display its follies and the extravagance connected therewith.

The governing classes alluded to, to retain power and a continuance of their prerogatives, have submitted to the class who live by hanging on "princes' favors," who flourish "where low-bowed baseness wafts perfume to pride," until peculations, robberies from Government, from banks, from communities and individuals, have become fashionable, and may soon become of importance enough to call for organization into joint-stock companies in order to be controlled. I cannot forbear to allude here to a certain class of teachers, who were formerly powerful for good, who have joined hands with corruption and justify themselves with the old maxim of the weak voluptuary, "Whose bread I eat, his song I sing."

The Commercial Advertiser (New York, January 6, 1880) makes the following remarkable statement:

The rumored additions to the great fortunes identified with Wall street from the successful speculation of 1879 are enormous in amount. These are some of the estimates: Added to the Vanderbilt estate, $30,000,000; to the wealth of Jay Gould, $15,000,000; to the wealth of Russell Sage, $10,000,000; Sidney Dillon, $10,000,000; James R. Keene, $2,000,000; to the First National Bank, $2,000,000; to Drexel, Morgan & Co., $2,000,000, and to three or four other great speculators, $3,000,000, giving a total of profits of $80,000,000 to about ten or twelve estates in a single year.

I also quote the remarks of a distinguished clergyman of Boston:

We have had enough of these colossal men, made rich out of the industry of the poor and weak—such men as Blaine, who walks into a convention with $70,000 of railroad bonds in his pocket, saying, "Obey me! Blaine and Maine are one!" Cameron with millions obtained from the Government, saying to Pennsylvania, "Make my son senator," and Pennsylvania obeys; Tom Scott holding a bill of sale of half the legislators of the States through which his roads pass, who slaps his pocket and cries, "By this I conquer!" President Garrett, carrying in the hollow of his hand the Assemblies of West Virginia and Maryland, exclaiming with Richelieu, "I am the State!" What has been the example of these giants of finance? How have they helped the cause of morality and religion? Like the mantle of charity, their gold covers a multitude of sins. They shine by its glitter rather than by their virtue. Vanderbilt gives $20,000 to a church out of twenty millions derived from watered stock, and erects a brazen statue, which an obsequious Methodist bishop was found willing to dedicate. A. T. Stewart, crushing out thousands of honest merchants to aggrandize himself, has a church to his honor when dead, that he would not go into when living! Let men look with distrust on the oppressors of the poor—on ill-gotten wealth. Public opinion, which makes law and is more powerful than law—let it scout such men from society and brand them with its heaviest condemnation.

Who are the productive forces? Who is it that digs the mines, produces the gold and iron, makes the machinery, weaves the cloth, raises the grain, builds our dwellings, makes the paper, prints the book? The workingman! By whom are these monopolists, corporations, the whole royal class of idlers, the stockholders and dividend-drawers, supported? By the workingman, the miner of Pennsylvania, the railroadman of the West, the cotton hand of the South, the mill hand of the North.

This is only a true picture of the condition of society in the United States. The industrial classes, the owners of the farm, mill, and shop, have a class to fight which can be best described in the following language of Burke in his description of the conquest and subjection of India by Clive and Hastings, a century or more ago:

Animated with all the avarice and all the impetuous ardor of youths, they roll in, one after another, wave after wave; while nothing presents itself to the view of the unhappy natives, except an interminable prospect of new flights of voracious birds of passage, with appetites insatiable for food, which is continually wasting under the attacks. Every other conqueror, Arab, Tartar, or Persian, has left behind some monument either of royal splendor or of useful benevolence; England has created neither churches nor hospitals nor schools nor palaces. If to-morrow we were expelled from Hindostan, nothing would remain to indicate that it had been possessed, during the inglorious period of our dominion, by any better tenants than the orang-outang or the tiger.

This dark picture of the English rule in India clearly illustrates the condition of the industrial classes who have suffered eighteen years of republican rule in this country—a rule, which they have been able to maintain in consequence of a divided opposition and the skillful kindling of fires which should have been extinguished by our civilization.

Centuries, with all their countless changes in the condition of mankind, have not and cannot change the heart of man, which was made in him by his Creator; the same overruling tendency of his nature consequent upon the cultivation of avarice remains a fixed but deplorable fact in the law of his creation, and a warning to all wise statesmen to legislate to protect the weak from the aggressions of the strong.

OUR BONDED SHIP MAKES A SUCCESSFUL VOYAGE WITH THE NATIONAL BANKS.

Our system of banking upon national bonds was inaugurated as a war measure mainly for the purpose of making a market for our bonds; and they unquestionably performed in a large degree this duty to the Government in the amount of bonds they absorbed to bank upon and as fiscal agents for the Government in the sale of bonds; but all this was done at a very great expense to the people and a large profit to the bondholders, as the large fortunes accumulated manifestly prove.

The national-bank act of February 28, 1863, superseded by the act of June 3, 1864, to provide a national-bank currency secured by a pledge of the United States bonds, provided that for every dollar of United States bonds placed with the Treasurer at Washington ninety cents of national-bank currency shall be issued to each banking association, which draws the interest on these bonds while hypothecated to the Government for currency circulation. When those banking associations went into operation—a majority of them June 3, 1864—greenbacks, lawful money, were worth 210.7 for the coin dollar. There were four hundred millions of greenbacks then in circulation and forty-eight millions of fractional currency. The decline in currency and lawful money up to this time consequent upon the suspension by the banks of specie payment and the provision of law limiting the money power of the greenback was as follows:

January, 1863.....	145
January, 1864.....	155
June 3, 1864.....	210
January, 1865.....	216

The controverted question between parties as to what caused this large decline in our legal-tender money I will not discuss at this time; for the purpose of my present argument it is enough for me to show the profit the banks made which went into operation in 1863, 1864, and 1865. They purchased their bonds with lawful money to bank upon at an average price of fifty-three or fifty-eight cents in coin on the dollar, making from 16 to 20 per cent. in coin, besides interest on their bonds in gold and interest for all loans made, which could not have been less than 17 per cent. each year on their entire capital. Coin was worth in greenbacks—January, 1866, 140; January, 1867, 134; January, 1868, 138; January, 1869, 135.

March, 1869, (section 3693, Revised Statutes,) the following act was passed:

The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

It will be seen that all the lawful money then issued, including the national-bank currency, and all property, both real and personal, and all debts and mortgages in the United States were valued in a currency worth 135.6 for every coin dollar, and was changed by this act into coin, subjecting the holders to a loss of 35.6 cents on each dollar. Who derived the benefit from this change of the standard of value by law?

First ascertain how much we owed March, 1869, when the standard was changed by law from lawful money to coin, and then we can measure the loss that the Congress which was elected in 1868 subjected us to, and we shall also have a base of calculation to determine the loss sustained by the country at large:

Public debt ($390,236,788 being legal tender and fractional currency).....	$2,588,452,213
National bank currency in circulation January 1, 1869.....	299,629,322

Amount..... 2,888,081,535

This vast sum was changed by law from lawful money then worth 135.6 for each one hundred cents in coin.

It would necessarily take thirty-five and one-half cents more on each dollar to pay our outstanding debt which amounts to $1,025,269,934, which is the price paid to holders of United States bonds as a gratuity.

THE VALUATION OF 1870.

The true value of real and personal estates was $30,068,518,507; 25 per cent. of which is $10,523,980,877; which is the true amount of loss consequent upon the change of the standard of value made by law in 1869.

I will not follow farther our legislation in this regard. The appreciation of the greenback from this time until the equalization of our currency, which occurred in 1879, is a chapter in our history fraught with too many disasters to business industries and surrounded by too many sickening details of partisan strife, which may in the end culminate in a change of our institutions by the threatened installation of a stronger government.

The difference between the two theories of currency reform is simply this: one side believes that equalization of our currency could only be reached by shrinkage of the volume of the currency and values of property, real and personal; the other side, that with the maintenance of law as to existing contracts, payment of bonds according to law and legal enactments, making lawful money receivable for custom dues and for interest on bonds, the full volume of money then issued could have been maintained; that the unemployed labor alone for six years caused a larger loss than the whole amount of currency then in existence; that this idle labor, if employed, would have produced an amount of wealth that would have brought us more speedily to equalization of the currency, and that, too, without disaster. This theory seems to me to be true, judging from the improvement consequent upon the formation of the greenback party, which occurred in 1876, and which, with the help of those having kindred views, has had a far-reaching influence upon legislation, in preventing a continued shrinkage of our currency. Nothing but this influence forced upon Congress the act of May 31, 1878, preventing the retiring of any more legal-tender notes, and providing that when redeemed they should be reissued. This act exists to-day and cannot be changed. We defy the money power to make the attempt. They reply: "We will let well enough alone;" which means, "we will wait until we get the power."

The same influences contributed to the passage of the act of February 28, 1878, providing for the coinage of not less than two millions a month of standard silver dollars.

These two acts, so persistently opposed by the republicans, have restored confidence and prepared the public for the improvement that has already occurred; fortunately for our prosperity our increased exports consequent upon short crops in Europe has assisted us out of our difficulties.

BALANCE OF TRADE.

The excess of exports over imports of merchandise, stated in specie values, was as follows:

Month ended January 31, 1880.....	$11,817,477
Month ended January 31, 1879.....	25,893,554
Seven months ended January 31, 1880.....	148,198,036
Seven months ended January 31, 1879.....	175,518,009
Twelve months ended January 31, 1880.....	237,341,003
Twelve months ended January 31, 1879.....	297,633,315
In all for 1879 and 1880.....	534,974,408

This large balance in our favor indicates that we are indebted chiefly to the producers and to the misfortune of Europe for our improved financial condition. The larger part of this came back to us in our bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury, who claims the credit of this, had about as much to do with bringing about equalization of our currency and improved times as Columbus had to do with the eclipse of the sun, which he played off on the savages of the island of Hayti to induce them to bring out their treasures or he would darken the world.

The expansion of 1879 settles all controversy as to which theory, expansion or contraction, we must attribute our present improved financial condition. I quote from the Boston-Herald an article on

ONE YEAR'S EXPANSION.

The expansion of American currency during the year 1879 is by far the largest sound inflation that ever in any twelvemonth stimulated the growth of business throughout the United States. The official figures are still incomplete on some points, but it is possible to reach a fairly accurate measurement of the unparalleled increase. The imports of gold rank first in both amount and uncommonness.

The addition to the stock of gold in the country stands by our reckoning as under estimate of gold expansion in 1879:

Net imports into United States.....	$74,556,191
Production of United States.....	36,000,000
Total increase.....	110,556,191

The silver dollar claims the third place as an expander of the currency. We have not seen an official statement of the coinage, but the amount minted in the twelvemonth runs very close to $27,300,000. Of this supply $16,463,235 passed into the vaults of the Treasury, leaving a sum of $10,836,765 added to the active circulation. There was also an increase of about $2,500,000 in the amount of silver certificates outstanding. Thus the inflation of silver aggregated $29,800,000 for the year. Counting silver and gold together, the direct and indirect increase of the metallic currency reached a total of $140,356,191. There was also an increase of $18,633,362 to the amount of national-bank currency. The greenbacks remained at $346,681,616, but the changes in the amounts held by the Treasury operated as a substantial addition of $5,018,989 to the outstanding issue of Treasury notes. We summarize below the total expansion from all sources during the year:

Expansion of the currency in 1879:
Increase of gold.....	$110,556,191
Increase of silver dollars.....	29,800,000
Increase of national-bank notes.....	18,633,362
Practical increase of greenbacks.....	5,018,989
Total expansion of year.....	164,013,542

CURRENCY.

What is the legal-tender Treasury note which we propose to substitute? The obligation of the nation issued direct as a lawful money, untrammelled by the machinery of corporations, whose existence is solely for profit at an enormous expense to industry. Let us look at the cost of the national-bank currency. Three hundred and sixty millions of bonds pledged for circulation, interest at 5 per cent., $18,000,000; less 1 per cent. paid for same on a circulation of $335,134,504, total, $3,351,345; actual cost to the country, $14,648,655. This result may be increased or lessened a trifle by the lessening of the capital or circulation and by adding the expense of maintaining the machinery of the banking act by the United States Treasury.

The argument often used to justify the continuance of the national-bank system as to the large amount of taxes they pay on deposits and for State, county, and town taxes is entirely fallacious. At no time in the past have banks been allowed to exist without paying State, county, and town taxation, and it is fair to presume that a tax-ridden people will not relieve capital, organized or unorganized, without assessing on it a share of the public burdens. The Comptroller of the Currency says "the rate of taxation imposed on the deposits and capital of State banks and private bankers is precisely the same as that imposed upon national banks." State banks are prohibited from issuing circulation by a 10 per cent. tax. I know it is urged that bank managers are safe custodians of the power to issue money and can best know the wants of the business community as to the quantity of circulation needed by the people. This I deny. Again, that it would not be expedient or wise to trust Congress to authorize the issue of a non-interest-bearing bond or legal-tender Treasury note for the convenience of the people; but it would answer to trust them to issue to the largest amount an interest-bearing bond, to run thirty or forty years, and to make it non-taxable as it passes from father to son. Such arguments are hardly worth answering, manifestly used to deceive the unthoughtful. If Congress can safely issue paper obligations, to become a lasting and weighty burden on all property and industry, surely it can be trusted to issue, when the exigency requires, the Treasury note to meet the temporary wants of maturing debt, to say nothing about the wants of the people for a circulating medium.

The President and Secretary of the Treasury now recommend the retirement and deprivation of legal-tender functions to the legal-tender notes, really to force upon the country the national-bank currency which can be extended legally to the amount of all bonds issued.

The venerable Peter Cooper in his letter of thanks to Senators BECK, COKE, and MORGAN says:

It seems hardly credible that any man with the opportunities for observation possessed by Senator BAYARD should now stand upon the floor of the Senate and advocate a bill the design of which is to destroy $346,000,000 more of the money with which the people do business and pay their debts, or that any man should be so exacting as to wish to legally compel debtors to procure gold coin to discharge all this burden of debt. Whatever may have been the result of the destruction of the people's money in the past, to destroy the balance of the legal-tender notes now would increase disaster fourfold. It rejoices me to find men of your intelligence, gentlemen, raising their voices against this iniquitous scheme.

Senator BECK says in reply:

I agree fully with you in the opinion that it would be a public misfortune to have all the debt-paying currency of the country under the control of the national banks; with the unlimited power they have to expand and contract their issues, the business of the country would soon be at their mercy.

I had so many things to notice, when I spoke, that I failed to make as clear as I ought the fact that the resolution for the passage of which your New York friends are so clamorous degrades the United States notes far below the national-bank notes; indeed, maintains them only as a debased currency for the benefit and protection of the banks!

Hon. JOHN M. BRIGHT, in his able speech, February 14, says:

The House will pardon a glance at a few of the Secretary's inconsistencies. He claims the glory of his forced resumption; yet he denounced its incalculable evils. He opposed making legal-tender notes receivable for custom duties; yet he receives them for customs. He opposes the remonetization of the silver dollar; yet he boasts its accumulation in the Treasury as an auxiliary to resumption. He and his friends claim that his policy brought prosperity to the country; yet he forgets that the heavens dropped fatness on the land. He claims that he brought greenbacks up to par with gold; yet he recommends to Congress that their tender quality in the payment of private debts should be stricken out, so that it would cease to be lawful money. And after his work of funding, contraction, forced resumption, and consequent financial ruin of one hundred thousand of good business men and the forging of financial fetters for an enslaved posterity, yet he now finds that the people do not want his hoarded coin and prefer the greenbacks in their business transactions. After blundering through a long financial experience he is brought to the knowledge of the fact that greenbacks used for all purposes as coin need no redemption.

OUR BONDED SHIP MAKES A SHORT VOYAGE IN THE INTEREST OF AN EXCLUSIVE GOLD CURRENCY AND MEETS WITH A HEAVY GALE.

The question of remonetization of silver is unavoidably connected with refunding of our maturing bonds. Two parties exist in this country of about equal strength as to the expediency of fully remonetizing silver; the wise statesman would take this question into consideration before determining the practicability of extending our national debt by the issue of long bonds.

as a money metal escaped the attacks of avarice for thousands of years, with the exception, that of Great Britain, (sixty-four years ago), who from enlightened selfishness demonetized silver for her home business, but continued it in her Indian empire, where commerce required its continuance. Until a recent date her influence had not produced any change in Europe. We have every assurance that those governments of Europe which have been unmindful of the interests of their people under her influence are fast retracing their steps and will soon return to their former condition in regard to the utilization of silver as a money metal.

Our Constitution impliedly made silver one of the money metals by prohibiting the States from making anything but gold and silver coin a legal tender. The avarice of the bondholder of the United States who has controlled legislation has set up a new standard of value, and has imposed on the country in addition to the great wrong of 1869 an additional burden. Silver is now demonetized, the metal in which the laws of 1869, 1870, and 1871 provided the bonds should be paid, and of the standard of fineness fixed by the law of 1837; thus making an exclusive gold standard. As the amount of coin existing by law fixes the value of all property and the value of all industry, by striking down silver—about half the coin of the world—you lessen values just in proportion as you lessen the material that the law obliges you to measure them by. To restate this: reduce the money metal one-half, you double the purchasing power of that that you retain, and this for the exclusive benefit of those having it or the paper that by law can call for it in payment. This is the true inwardness of all legislation for the demonetization of silver, which was so slyly accomplished by the few words smuggled into the Revised Statutes February 12, 1873:

The silver coin of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

I have not time further to allude to this monstrous cheat. Suffice it to say by this legislation 20 per cent. profit was to be made by the holders of our funded debt. For the consideration of those who may differ as to what money is, allow me to quote authorities as to the utility of having it in increased quantities in order to promote prosperity:

The two greatest events which have occurred in the history of mankind have been directly brought about by a successive contraction and expansion of the circulating medium of society. The fall of the Roman Empire, so long ascribed to ignorance to slavery, heathenism, and moral corruption, was in reality brought about by a decline in the silver and gold mines of Spain and Greece.

And, as if Providence had intended to reveal in the clearest manner the influence of this mighty agent on human affairs, the resurrection of mankind from the ruin which these causes had produced was owing to the directly opposite set of agencies being put in operation. Columbus led the way in the career of renovation; when he spread his sails across the Atlantic, he bore mankind and its fortunes in his bark.

The annual supply of the precious metals for the use of the globe was tripled; before a century had expired the prices of every species of produce were quadrupled. The weight of debt and taxes insensibly wore off under the influence of that prodigious increase; in the renovations of industry the relations of society were changed; the weight of feudalism cast off; the rights of man established. Among the many concurring causes which conspired to bring about this mighty consummation, the most important, though hitherto the least observed, was the discovery of Mexico and Peru.—Sir Archibald Alison, History of Europe.

When the various states of Europe suddenly determined to have a gold standard and took steps to carry it into effect, it was quite evident that we must prepare ourselves for great convulsions in the money market, not occasioned by speculation or any old cause which has been alleged, but by a new cause with which we are not sufficiently acquainted, and the consequences of which are very embarrassing.—Disraeli, (Lord Beaconsfield), speech at Glasgow, November 19, 1873.

To annul the use of either of the metals as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full with the evils of a scanty circulation.—Alexander Hamilton, Report on the Mint.

The public indebtedness of the civilized world to-day probably stands between $25,000,000,000 and $30,000,000,000 of American money. The volume of private debts, including the capitalized value of fixed charges—loans, annuities, &c.—is vastly greater. Nearly the whole of this body of obligations is payable, interest and principal, (where the principal sum is to be paid), in money. The question whether the supply of money shall increase or decrease is, then, the question whether the burden of these more or less permanent charges shall be diminished or enhanced.—F. A. Walker, Money, 1878.

B. F. Nourse, of Boston, a leading banker, writes Hon. G. F. HOAR in the New York Tribune:

Merchants, bankers, manufacturers, and other thoughtful business men of the classes who best and most practically understand all the causes of depression arising from past excesses in production, trade, use of credit, and all other causes contributing to the existing condition of distress are awakened to recognize that, when all due allowance is made for these multifarious and weighty causes, there has been one cause of depression mightier and weightier than all others, operating with resistless and accelerating force since 1873—the demonetization of silver, which then beginning in Germany has since become general throughout Europe.

Mr. BLAINE says in his speech delivered in the United States Senate February 7, 1878:

The destruction of silver as money and establishing gold as the sole unit of value must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property except those investments which yield a fixed return in money. These would be enormously enhanced in value, and would gain a disproportionate and unfair advantage over every other species of property. If, as the most reliable statistics affirm, there are nearly seven thousand millions of coin or bullion in the world, not very unequally divided between gold and silver, it is impossible to strike silver out of existence as money without results which will prove distressing to millions and utterly disastrous to tens of thousands.

Happily we have a partial remonetization of silver, brought about after a desperate fight with the money power. Happier still shall we be when reason shall return to us as a nation, tempered with that high sense of honor to all classes, so that if the sweat of the brow of our toiling millions must pay a debt double what it should have been, made so to enrich a favored class, we, countrymen, can say to those wont to cluster around our frugal board—those who are soon to take our place in the Government and in the battle of life—if we must leave you a debt to pay, large indeed and hard to be borne, it is payable in a coin of the legal value of 1870, the material of which is accessible, even abundant, and within the reach of your industry.

TAXATION.

But no matter what course your legislation may take, it will avail nothing to relieve the people without rigorous laws for equalizing taxation. Increase money per capita, double the circulating medium, if you please; it will in the end be a failure. The laws of trade, as sure as the laws of gravitation, will in time pass all the money from him who pays the taxes to him whose wealth is untaxed. No legitimate business is now profitable enough in this country to exist for any time burdened by the present taxation levied as it is.

Our industry, as statistics show, is but 3 per cent. per annum. If one-half of our wealth, as is estimated now, escapes taxation, sixty-six years will pass all real and movables from the tax-payer into the hands of the non-tax-payer.

When you have apportioned to wealth, the crystallized labor of the past, its legitimate share of public burdens, you have laid the cornerstone of all permanent improvement. To do this you can join hands with him whom you may now differ with politically. He who is for reform by equalizing taxation and by reducing expenditures, and thereby lightening the burdens imposed on labor and industry by our Government, is one of our party. If we, perchance, may have some advanced ideas of currency reform worthy of attention, we must remember they should be based on his fundamental principles of reform, which alone can lead to permanent prosperity.

If we represent the light, the reformer represents the pyramid which towers above the rocks; united we can become the instrument to guide the ship of state into the safe harbor of equal rights, equal burdens and a renovated constitution.

REFUNDING THE DEBT REDEEMABLE IN 1881.

The able speech of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means should be read by every voter in the United States. The criticism he has given us of the proceedings of the Secretary of the Treasury, as to the faults and errors of the administration of his Department, in his intercourse with the bankers of the United States, leads me to ask this question in all honesty: Can we have a Secretary—has God Almighty created a man able to cope with the combined shrewdness of the world, which has culminated in the modern word syndicate?

I quote the statement of the Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, in his speech of March 4, showing the cost of refunding and the parties most benefited by the same.

It is certain that circumstances of some kind have not only enabled the Government to obtain loans at 4 per cent. per annum interest, but also to have enabled a few parties to amass enormous fortunes in the operation. I cannot with any approach to accuracy estimate the total profits that have been realized in these transactions. The total amount of 4 per cent. bonds issued is about $740,000,000. These were sold at par and a half per cent. commission allowed to the purchasers, netting to the Government 99½ per cent. upon the amount sold.

The account, therefore, stands thus:

Present market value, at 107 per cent., on $740,000,000	$831,800,000
$740,000,000 4 per cent. bonds, netting 99½	736,300,000

Making a profit to the holders and loss to the Government of 115,500,000

Is it not a proper subject of inquiry as to who has made this profit and what relation the parties bear to the Government? Of course, as these bonds have been distributed in many different quarters, it would be impossible to ascertain the history of each. We must do the best we can. Fortunately we are not left in the dark as to the principal purchaser.

The following statements of the First National Bank of New York will furnish enough data upon which to conjecture the method by which the $740,000,000 bonds have been disposed of.

The following is the official report of the condition of the First National Bank of New York, June 14, 1879:

By this report it will be seen that on the 14th of June, 1879, with a capital of only a half million dollars, this bank owed the Government $128,109,071, and held bonds of the United States for $129,152,740.

These were very large sums of both debits and credits for so small an institution to deal in. I know that it is said that the bonds are not delivered until paid for, and that this apparent mammoth operation is simply a fiction of book-keeping. If this is really so, the fact remains that by some inexplicable advantage a small private banking institution, the property of three men, has obtained the facilities for the holding of enormous sums of the Government bonds by which they have acquired immense profits.

The following is the circular of this bank issued to its correspondents on the 7th of October, 1879:

"To our correspondents.

"FIRST NATIONAL BANK,
"New York, October 7, 1879.

"DEAR SIRS: With much satisfaction we hand you herewith statement, condensed from the report of this bank to the Comptroller of the Currency, under date of October 2, and invite its comparison with our previous reports.

"It exhibits the final liquidation of our large transactions with the Treasury Department in the 4 per cent. loan, the last payment upon which was made on September 30:

Our direct subscriptions for the four percents from January 1 to the close of the loan footed $208,500,000, the cost of which was... $209,584,893 82
Add to this the balance at credit of the Department on 1st January..... 19,757,948 50

And our payments to the Treasury during the nine months aggregated..... 229,342,842 32

All of which has been completed without loss or error.

We may add that the total amount of United States bonds of all issues sold and delivered by this bank from January 1 to October 1, inclusive, was..... 341,732,450 00
Called bonds purchased during same period..... 181,300,550 00

Making amount of United States bonds passing through our hands within these dates..... 523,033,000 00

"The above figures embrace a total of $284,385,600 four percents, of which $208,500,000 were taken directly from the Government and $75,885,600 were purchased by us in the market and represent original subscriptions made by others.

"We find, also, going back to the introduction of the loan, that we have sold in all $400,449,050 out of the entire issue of $737,157,050 four percents.

"Respectfully,

"GEORGE F. BAKER, President."

From this statement it will be seen that this bank boasts that out of the total amount of 4 per cent. bonds issued up to that time ($737,157,050) it had sold $400,449,050, or over one-half, and that the total amount of United States bonds it had handled in nine months amounted to $523,033,000.

There is no instance in the history of this or any other government where anything like this has occurred. Neither the Bank of England nor the Rothschilds have held relations with either or all of the governments of Europe by which they had the privilege and consequent profits of negotiating so large an amount of government bonds within the same time.

May 1, 1881, five percents.....	$508,440,350
June 30, 1881, six percents.....	254,392,530
July 1, 1881, six percents.....	823,800
Total.....	763,656,700

The surplus revenue last year was about twenty-five millions. The increasing revenue consequent upon improvement in business cannot fall short of seventy-five millions this year. The amount of coin on hand for resumption purposes is at least one hundred and sixty-five millions. Calling 25 per cent. the amount necessary to be held as a reserve for continual redemption of greenbacks, which amounts to eighty-five millions, we have left eighty millions of idle money now in the Treasury. So that the debt can be reduced by May 1, 1881, to about six hundred millions, which remains to be provided for. Now, to pay this six hundred millions—

First. Issue Treasury notes—one hundred millions—payable yearly for six years, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government;

Second. Institute an income tax upon non-taxable property, or on all incomes over $1,000;

Third. Remonetize silver, which will give a great impetus to all business;

Fourth. Lessen the expenditures of Government in every Department 10 per cent., excepting interest on public debt. This can be done without injury to any one if the assessments for political purposes, which it is understood amount to 10 per cent. of the salaries of all in the employ of the Government, are discontinued.

Without the payment of your debt as it matures, years of extravagant expenditure will come. It is certain that there will be a surplus of revenue. One of two things will result from the refunding bill under consideration, if adopted: The tariff and internal taxation will have to go or be increased—yes, wild expenditure will have to come. Are you prepared for either?

A wise course, it seems to me, is to pay the maturing debt. After this relieve industry by repealing all internal taxation, and modify the tariff on imports in a manner for the benefit of all.

Mr. Chairman, what were we sent here for? What do the people expect? Is it our farmers, producers, and laborers who ask for a continuance of a system so fraught with danger, so gilded by tempting extravagance? I beg of you leave no room to doubt as to the course you will pursue. Let our motto be, "Lead us not into temptation."

The republican orator, when he looks at the record of his party in the matter of a magnificent bonded debt, can well exclaim, "What a mighty achievement!" What country can present so vast a record in so short a time of the subjection of so great a nation to bonded wealth—extraordinary both for the power of those who could impose the burden and for those who have been educated so nobly to bear it. Truly, it is a development of a holy patriotism, born of the love of country at an epoch when that country was governed by equal laws, equal rights, and equal taxation.

Will not the wail that comes to us from the toiling millions of England, Ireland, Germany, France, Spain, Russia, and Austria be heeded to stop this grand scheme of oppression, and imitation of the dynasties of Europe? Must we wait until every hearth-stone sends up its warning voice from this broad land, "Thus far shalt thou go, and here shall thy proud waves be staid?"

In conclusion let me say, the utterances of republican leaders that something is wanting to strengthen our existing institutions is but the wail of a departing dynasty, who begin to feel they have not the voice of the people to sustain them. They feel that their rule by class legislation is passing away. They who escape public burdens by a system of legal robbery must know that soon they will be brought to appreciate the power of the people, now so forcibly reminded that the price of liberty is eternal vigilance.

We have already reversed the engine. We have changed the direction of the ship of state. We have fixed the policy that the legal-tender notes shall not be withdrawn. This will revive business now developing in the great centers, soon to extend to the circumference. The next wave of the popular voice will revive commerce, which will once more spread its wings on every ocean, when our young men can "go down to the sea in ships and do business on the great waters."

Welcome the day when we can announce no more bonds shall be issued! Welcome the day when we can say taxation shall and must be reduced and be made equal! Welcome the day when the industrious laborer can say the closing years of the nineteenth century have brought with them an abundant civilization, with instrumentalities for the distribution of the comforts of life among those whose labor has made this the golden age of the American Republic!

Mr. SAMFORD. Mr. Chairman, there are $764,000,000 of Government bonds maturing within the next fifteen months, some of them bearing interest at 5, others at 6 per cent. The bill under consideration, known as the bill of the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] provides for refunding these bonds at 3½ per cent. instead of the present high rate, and further provides that $200,000,000 of them shall be payable within the next ten years, the remainder to be payable at the end of forty years, the Government having the option of paying them after twenty years. There was a contest between the honorable gentleman who reports this bill, and the Secretary of the Treasury, as to whether the rate of interest should be 4 per cent., as recommended by the Secretary, or 3½, as contended for by the gentleman, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.] There can be no question that as between the two propositions, the latter is vastly better for the tax-payers, and the gentleman from New York is entitled to the gratitude of the country for his victory. As between the two propositions, and as between the bill and the present status of the debt, with its high rate of interest, I shall, of course, favor the bill, because its annual saving will be large, over both the others. But I hope we may obtain something better than either of the three, as I will try to demonstrate before I conclude.

But before addressing myself to the particular measure under discussion, I shall briefly indulge in some general remarks, somewhat foreign perhaps, to a literal consideration of this measure, for the reason that under the rules of the House, it is a difficult matter for any member, except those who constitute the two leading committees, to obtain an hour for the expression of his views.

Many of us on this floor represent constituencies composed largely of agricultural producers and consumers, and therefore the real tax-paying class of the country. And while I believe we are in a majority here, yet the minority, who represent tax-consuming constituencies, by a species of sophistry, succeed year after year, by so mystifying all financial questions, and by artful appeals to partisanship, in spite of justice and right, in keeping the yoke of bondage on honest effort and honest toil.

Mr. Chairman, I have no sympathy with a senseless communistic clamor against fairly acquired wealth. An indiscriminate and wild denunciation of fortunate possessors of money, is not only illogical, but contemptible, and can find applause only from the thoughtless and irresponsible, whose favors will be unsubstantial and fleeting. But even if they were more lasting, I have no ambition to win honors gained by arts like these. I have no desire to be popularized by a course so questionable in its methods, so regardless of right and justice, so thoughtless, as to be almost if not quite criminal. To the man who has successfully battled and won in the affairs of life I have no word of unjust condemnation. On the contrary, he has my esteem, admiration, and commendation. But, sir, I do abhor and detest that species of legislation which under the forms of law wring substance from one class of citizens for the benefit of another. Indeed, such legislation is nothing more or less than legalized robbery, and that, too, of the most vicious kind, in that the majesty of the law is invoked to inflict the wrong upon the victimized citizen.

Now, sir, the financial policy of this Government for the past fifteen years has not only been in the interest of money-lords, and exclusively so, but that policy has been absolutely dictated in all of its detail by them and their agents, and by ways so artful and shrewd, that while the toiling masses of the people have felt the burden and experienced the oppression, they have been unable to see, much less prevent, the agencies of their great wrong; and by the legislation which has been enacted in this House, where they had a right to expect protection, they have been fleeced out of their earnings, and had them transferred to the coffers of others, until we have in this country presented, the spectacle of mammoth fortunes for the few, accreted by a systematized pilfering from the many, which foreshadows only evil to the institutions of the country.

This concentration of wealth in the hands of a few, has naturally banded its possessors together, in alliances defensive against legislative attack, and offensive for greater aggrandizement. The logic of such combination is to create great corporations, so that the agencies for the promotion of the common design may be more effective in one executive head, whose body shall be without a soul, yet nevertheless immortal. Thus concentrated, it shapes legislation and controls the Government. It is a rapid but steady ingraftment upon our body-politic of those evils incident to primogeniture and entailment, which for long years our wise men have been endeavoring to uproot from American soil. Its tendency is to dwarf individual enterprise, activity, and effort in the accursed shadow of great corporations; and its final result will be to destroy individual right and individual liberty, in order to aggrandize the interests of wealth as represented in the persons of these quasi citizens.

Sir, the cardinal principle of our Government is the protection of individual freedom, to provide barriers against tyranny. This was once thought to be a vital question in legislation, but merchandise, and commerce, and speculation have congregated wealth, which has demanded protection, in proportion to its growth, until, by degrees, it has absorbed the attention of the law-making power, has ingrafted upon the statute-book pains and penalties, as refined and severe as the veriest Shylock could ask, and, by a transition illogical but natural, tutored the mind of the statesman to believe that all laws should be in the interest of money, and capital, and corporate rights. Hence in these latter days the interests of money, of capitalists, of property rights, have been advanced by legislation, if need be, at the expense of great wrong, unjust exaction, and total disregard of the just demands of the unfortunate citizens whose only offense is poverty.

Sir, I need not elaborate the sinuous methods by which the money-changers of this country have dragged an unrepresented people into a bondage, as complete as the Israelitish bondage to Pharaoh. Step by step, "here a little and there a little," they have steadily moved on, by congressional enactment, to the mortgaging of the resources, and muscle, and toil, of this land, "to have and to hold to them their heirs and assigns forever."

"Money brings leisure, leisure brings thought, and thought brings power," while poverty brings toil, toil brings weariness, and weariness brings sleep, and while the man of toil has slept the bondholder has thought and schemed in the dead hour of night, and spun from his busy brain the "new ropes that were never occupied," with which to bind the sleeping Samson. Some day he may awake and give fearful point to the illustration by completing the parallel. While I may not elaborate, yet a momentary glance at these methods may not be altogether unprofitable, even though it shall serve no other purpose than to remind the people of the devotion of the republican party to all their interests.

Having procured a bond to be authorized, forever free from taxation, protected but not taxed, requiring all the officers and agencies of law to protect them, but furnishing not one cent to support its expensive machinery, and requiring the customs revenues of the country to be devoted, first, to payment of the interest in coin, the bondholder bought it at far less than its face value, about forty cents on the dollar.

Being thus provided with an estate, rich in golden results for himself and his children after him, before the din of battle had been hushed, before the black clouds of war had disappeared from the horizon, while other men were gathering together the fragments which escaped the wreck of war, he lost no time, but hastened by constitutional amendment, to place the sanctity of his bond beyond the reach of question, safe from all contingency, in the fundamental law of the land, where it can never be disturbed, and never will be, for every officer of this Government, from the President to the lowest constable, before entering in office swears to sustain his bond, so help him God.

Notwithstanding these bonds were payable in greenbacks in their face, in effect, yet greenbacks were at a discount, and though the Government had the option of so paying them at that time; with a stealthy tread the bondholder glided along the corridors, and into the committee-rooms of this Capitol, and with his soft, winning eloquence persuaded a republican Congress to enact a law early in 1869 providing that—

None of the interest-bearing obligations not already due, shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such times United States notes are convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin.

Mark you, according to law and the contract, these very bonds we are now considering could have been paid in greenbacks, but for this iniquitous law. But the bondholder was as "wise as a serpent" and harmful as a devil, and he knew that a subsequent Congress could repeal this law. He did not feel safe. His gyves and fetters were not sufficiently fastened on the limbs of toil.

What next? These bonds were payable in dollars, as I have said, and greenbacks were legal dollars, but greenbacks were below the value of the coin dollar, and were liable, in their very nature, never to be worth more, and would likely often be worth less than coin. The people's Representatives (God save the mark) again responded to the insatiate maw of greed, which like "the daughter of the horse-leech, continued to cry give, give," and allowed bonds payable in greenbacks, to be exchanged for bonds payable in their face in coin, thus securing them against repeal of law. While a servile republican Congress and President were thus prostituting the methods of legislation to the sordid demands of a moneyed oligarchy, a republican Supreme Court was declaring that greenbacks were legal tender, and good enough pay for the produce of the farmer and the wages of the laborer. But the law was passed, and $1,395,000,000 of bonds payable in currency were exchanged for bonds payable in coin. It would seem, in all conscience, that this was enough. But no; hardly had the ink dried which contained the unrighteous provision requiring coin to be paid, before the gold-bug, which was sucking the life-blood of labor, struck down, by methods so dark, so stealthy, and so unholy that to this day the hand that did it is unknown, the money capacity of silver, and left, so far as they could, the toiling men and women and children of this and coming generations to coin their sweat and brawn and blood into gold, that a privileged few might "dress in purple and fine linen, and fare sumptuously every day."

By these various methods, under the strict letter of the law, an advantage was given to the money-owner by appreciating his property to the amount of not less than $500,000,000, which he could never have had under the original contract. This extra burden was saddled on the industries of the country by the republican party.

And now, after securing with greenbacks two billions of untaxable bonds at less than half their face, interest payable in coin; after amending the Constitution to the effect that they should never be "questioned;" after setting apart the customs revenue as a special fund for the payment of the interest; after changing these bonds payable in currency for bonds payable in coin; after destroying the money value of a large part of the coin by demonetizing silver which increased the value of gold, they capped the climax of such infamous class legislation by a contraction of the currency, for the sole purpose of enhancing the purchasing power of money, and by that act alone doubled the value of money, doubled the value of the bonds, by doubling the purchasing capacity of money, notwithstanding such an unrighteous act strewn the land with the wrecks of fortunes, dissolved families, desolated firesides, destroyed human hopes, and involved honest effort in remediless ruin. Amid all this "hopeless anguish" of a people "steeped to the lips in misery," whose only "wealth was want," the bondholder reveled in luxurious ease, provided by congressional enactment.

Not simply the bondholder was thus favored, all capital was protected. Great corporations brought to bear their money power, and special privileges were accorded them; gigantic subsidies in money were freely granted, and millions of acres of the public domain were given them with a prodigal hand. Consolidated capital in factories was protected to the extent, good judges assert, of a thousand millions per annum by unjust tariff laws. From this grasp, from these avaricious clutches there seems to be no escape. Why, sir, becoming satisfied that from the Committee on Ways and Means no bill would be reported to the House, looking to the relief of the people from the unholy and unrighteous extortion of tariff duties, I sought to secure it, by referring bills looking to tariff reform, to a committee I had assurance would report them. This was the only hope, and I knew, and this House knew, that if these parliamentary tactics should fail, all effort for any relief was defeated. Notwithstanding one of those bills was to take the tariff from printing-paper and type, and therefore in the interest of dissemination of knowledge and information, it was ingloriously defeated, mainly by republican votes, and the bills were sent to the Ways and Means Committee, where no more mention will be made of them among men. They were sent "to the tomb of the Capulets," and no cenotaph even, will attest the fact they ever lived or died.

Mr. Chairman, other bills have been introduced in this House providing measures of relief; among others, financial bills. I do not mean those which, with all respect for their authors, seek the enactment into law, of the wild vagaries of fiat money, though even they should be reported for action; for it is political cowardice to smother any bill, and I am ready at any time to record my vote on any bill, and against it, if I consider it unwise. I refer to bills of financial soundness, against which nothing can be urged except that they are not in the interest of capital exclusively. They have gone into the Committee on Banking and Currency, where "they sleep the sleep that knows no waking."

But I am told that the country is prospering, that all business is booming. That is measurably true, thanks to a democratic law remonetizing silver, and to a kind Providence which has given us "the early and the latter rain," and gave to the people a modicum of prosperity, in spite of the burdens of taxation and the artfulness of capital. But let the balance of trade turn against us for one twelvemonth, as it will do sooner or later, and the present appearances of prosperity may be dissolved as mist in the morning. But suppose it shall continue for a series of years, and the people shall continue to make good crops and find ready markets, is that any reason why they should have injustice practiced, because they are able to stand it? Is that any reason why the public debt should be kept up for the sake of furnishing "a safe deposit place for the capital of this country," as the honorable author of the funding bill announces? Or, as he stated in another part of his exhaustive speech, that there may be an investment for "those who have surplus wealth, which they wish to secure against loss."

Ay, sir, these are the real reasons for these long bonds, and the distinguished gentleman was candid enough to admit it. "A safe place for capital," "secure against loss." Land, and houses, and merchandise, and farming and various enterprises, are all too unsafe for the surplus cash of the capitalist. And yet from these unsafe investments must come the money to pay the gold demanded by these "safe" investments. Why cannot this surplus capital, accumulated in a large measure from interest on Government bonds untaxed, go into the various industries of the land and help develop its wealth? Oh, no, that would require exertion and possibly a little work from its possessor, who prefers to put it in this "safe deposit" and live the life of luxurious ease, rather than risk it in enterprises, which would give employment to labor and add new impulse to all the channels of industry.

The man who buys a stock of goods risks his money, in the ventures of trade; the mechanic who builds a house risks his money and labor in performing the contract; the man who has the house built risks having paying tenants; they who delve in the caverns of the earth for gold and silver and copper and iron and coal, risk their all to obtain a livelihood for dependent wife and children; the manufacturer, the miller, the blacksmith, the artisan, all risk in the effort to improve their worldly condition; the farmer who puts his money in land and stocks, in labor and the implements of husbandry, risks the wind and flood and drought and blight. Every industry in the land is a risk, except the favored bondholder, who gets his return with each recurring season without a shadow of doubt. Fire may consume houses, taxation may absorb land, hard times may demolish the profit and principal of merchandise, and disaster may destroy crops, but from any or all of these misfortunes, the holder of a Government bond is absolutely safe, and yet we are told by the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] that we must have a long bond that, among other reasons, surplus capital may have a "safe deposit" "secure from loss."

Mr. Chairman, it would weary the committee, for me to elaborate the kindred ideas which are suggested in the discussion of the public debt of this country, but I have no doubt in my own mind, that it is the settled and determined aim of the money power, to prevent for all time, the material reduction, much less extinguishment, of the interest-bearing debt of the Government. It is too "safe" a place of deposit for capital. In their view a "national debt is a national blessing." Hence we see in this House that all manner of appropriation is advocated by the champions of the money interest; hence they view with complacency vast increase of pensioners, whether just or unjust, because they desire the revenues of the Government to be absorbed, so that nothing may be left to pay off the bonds. No matter to them how much is squandered, their interest is safe (that is all they want) from the customs dues.

True, the gentleman who reports this bill announces, that "it is our duty to relieve the people of such an enormous and unnecessary load, at the earliest practicable moment," and I will do him the justice to say, that I have no reason to doubt his sincerity, but he forthwith advocates a bill looking two ways at once, a reduction of interest and a long bond.

Now, I asserted that the financial managers of the Government, who are the representatives of the bondholders, do not intend to allow an extinguishment of the bonded debt. Let the figures speak for themselves. The bonded debt in 1873 amounted to $1,695,805,950, while in 1879 it reached the sum of $1,887,716,110. During the twelve years preceding and including 1879, there was paid interest to the amount of $1,363,448,846—and still the bonded debt increased in six years nearly $200,000,000. When such golden harvests as these are reaped, it is no wonder the debt is desired to be permanent, and a "safe deposit."

During these years there was no letting up of taxation, no diminution of revenue returns. On the contrary there was a rigid, ay, almost a vicious exaction of tax, and a golden stream flowed annually into the Treasury, in volume amounting to $300,000,000.

Do I object to the reduction of the rate of interest to 3½ per cent.? No, sir, I thank the gentleman from New York for the concession, which he has virtually wrung from the Secretary, and from the money power, that a 3½ instead of a 4 per cent. bond can be floated at par. For if these bonds should run forty years, as is possible under the bill, and as they will run, by this saving of ½ per cent., he will save on the $700,000,000 during the forty years, simple interest to the amount of $140,000,000. This is a great point gained, and for that act he deserves much honor.

His proposition to require $200,000,000 to be paid from current revenue is also a step in the right direction, but here it seems to my crude understanding, that he falls into that "overcautiousness," with which he charged the Secretary.

He has shown that there lies, in his own language, "in the Treasury, $73,537,748 idle and useless," exclusive of $86,670,250 held for resumption purposes. And yet he arranges his table thus:

January 1, 1880, amount of bonds to be redeemed.	$764,000,000
Probable amount to be paid from revenues the present year	20,000,000

Leaving amount to be refunded	744,000,000

Why not, at once, apply the $73,537,748 now idle and useless in the Treasury, to the payment of these bonds, and reduce the amount to $690,462,252 to be redeemed instead of $744,000,000? That would be an annual saving of nearly $2,000,000 at 3½ per cent. A business man would do this "as quick as lightning," and the gentleman says, "what is wise for an individual is wise for a government."

Suppose an individual should have outstanding interest-bearing notes, and should, at the same time, keep locked up in his safe, money lying "idle," and that, too, after he had made liberal estimates for all demands known, and contingent, would not such a course be the height of folly? If "what is wise for an individual is wise for a government," the converse is true: what is folly practiced by an individual, is equally foolish when practiced by a government.

But, again, the honorable gentleman informs us that there is also lying in the Treasury "$86,670,254 in coin, for resumption purposes." This money was obtained largely, if not wholly, by selling bonds bearing 4 or 4½ per cent. Hoarded for resumption purposes! Now, sir, I know I venture on doubtful ground. The question will be considered absurd by some, and be answered by a toss of the head or a shrug of the shoulders from others. But still I ask it: Why keep that sum idle? Why pay annually on that sum, even at 3½ per cent., over $3,000,000? I can see the necessity for individuals and private corporations to keep a reserve in coin, to inspire confidence in their ability to redeem their paper. But a great government, with limitless and illimitable resources, with boundless areas of public domain, with a busy, active, aggressive population of over forty millions in numbers, whose business annually aggregates billions, whose faith is pledged to the payment of its debts, does not need to place itself in the position required of individuals in order to keep its notes of issue at par. Why, sir, if an individual, even, owned a hundred thousand dollars' worth of property of such kind as that all men could see it, and was known and acknowledged by all men to be upright, honest, and honorable, his note for $10,000 would be taken at par, even if he did not have on hand a dollar in cash, much less would it be necessary for him to retain constantly by him 25 per cent. in cash of his indebtedness. Is this true? Every man knows it is. Why, then, is this great and rich Government required to do more? Even Mr. Sherman says in his report—

That actual resumption commenced, at the time fixed by law, without any material demand for coin.

And the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] who is as high authority in financial matters as the Secretary, assured us that—

It is evident that the public confidence in the solvency and credit of the Government was so great that no other security was required to effect resumption or maintain it afterward.

Many men, of conceded wisdom in other things, thought several years ago that the way for the Government "to resume" was "to resolve to resume." And resumption would be as fixed a fact to-day, in the absence of so much coin in the vaults of the Treasury, as if they were loaded down with it. Tell me why the holder of a ten-dollar greenback bill, would have less "confidence in the solvency and credit of the Government" if its bonded interest-bearing debt were decreased $86,000,000, than he would if that amount of coin lay idle, at a cost of $3,000,000 per annum. As the liability of the debtor diminishes, the value of outstanding obligations should increase. And the holder of national currency knows that it does. In the case of private bankers, laws required a reserve to be kept on hand to redeem their notes, among other reasons, lest bad investments should be lost and redemption be hazarded; for the purpose of immediate exchange, for transmission to other localities, and the like, and provided penalties against defalcations and abscondings. But the revenues and resources of the Government are liable to no such contingencies. Nothing short of the strain of war can affect its ability to pay, and if that should come, in any proportions, a small reserve fund would amount to nothing. There was no "material demand," says the Secretary, at the commencement of resumption; there is certainly less now. And a very few millions kept on hand, say ten million, would supply any demand that would be made. There is a law on the statute-book which will inspire all the confidence which coin on hand would afford, an act which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury "to use any surplus revenues from time to time in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to issue, sell, and dispose of" bonds bearing 5 per cent. interest, which, in the language again of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,]—

Would command all the coin required at twenty-four hours' notice. Certainly this is an abundant resource to meet any possible contingency that could arise in any emergency.

I think so too. If the law itself will not inspire the confidence necessary to maintain resumption, a single practical execution of it would. Therefore I argue that at least $76,000,000 of the idle reserve fund can be safely used, without jeopardizing resumption, to the extinguishment of that amount of bonds. The account would then stand, after deducting the acknowledged surplus, as I have shown, $690,462,252. Deduct of the resumption fund $76,000,000, leaving amount to be refunded $614,462,252, instead of the gentleman's figures of $744,000,000; a difference of in round numbers $130,000,000, making a yearly saving, at 3½ per cent. per annum, of $4,550,000, and a saving during the forty years these bonds will run of the enormous sum of $182,000,000. It does seem to me that statesmanship, honor, and duty demand of us to save the tax-payers of this country this crushing and unjust burden. Impressed with these views, nearly a year ago—June 16, 1879—I introduced a bill to carry into effect this very idea. This House referred it to the Committee on Ways and Means, where "it has rested" ever since. I offer it as an amendment to the pending bill, and sincerely hope it may be adopted.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Minnesota, who has just taken his seat, very forcibly asks whether it is not better to fund the matured bonds in three-and-a-half percents in long bonds, and take the annual surplus revenue, estimated by the Secretary at $50,000,000, and buy up 4½ per cent. bonds? and answers the question in the affirmative. I would agree with him but for two reasons: I do not think it necessary to refund but a small amount of these bonds; and, secondly, I have no faith that the annual surplus will be so applied. If a provision could be incorporated in this bill, which could insure that course, then I say it would be wise to adopt his view in regard to the small balance we cannot now pay.

But let us look further and see if any other deduction can be made from the large sum, unnecessary to be refunded. Of the bonds under discussion we find a part of them were issued as follows:

Authorizing act.	Rate of interest.	Date of maturity.	Amount
	Per cent.
February 8, 1861.....	6	December 31, 1880..	$18,415,000
July 17 and August 5, 1861.....	6	June 30, 1881.....	182,005,550
March 3, 1863.....	6	June 30, 1881.....	71,787,000
March 2, 1861.....	6	July 1, 1881.....	823,800

The promise to pay these bonds, in their very face, is as follows:

The United States of America are indebted unto _____, _____ dollars, redeemable after 31st day of December, 1880, with interest from _____ to _____ inclusive, at 6 per cent. per annum, payable the first days of January and July each year. This debt is authorized by act of Congress approved _____, 18—.

So it will be seen, in round numbers, that $270,000,000 of the bonds we are asked to fund in other long bonds, are payable a year hence in dollars. In coin dollars? Who says so? "Tis not so nominated in the bond." Greenbacks are legal dollars. The Supreme Court has said so. It matters not that the Supreme Court was packed, as is charged, to render that decision. Such a packing was done in the interest of capital. Let the decision "hew to the line, no matter where the chips may fall."

If greenbacks are dollars, then the bond is satisfied, the contract is literally complied with, when greenbacks are paid on it. The bondholder has no legal right to ask more, and God knows he has no moral right. It is simply robbery of the tax-payer to give him more. I have high authority for this just construction of the law; no less authority than John Sherman himself, who is now the lawyer of the bondholders in their avaricious game of grab. In the Senate, December 17, 1867, he said, in regard to these bonds:

The law does not expressly provide that the principal is payable in coin, but does provide that the "interest shall be paid in coin," thus raising the implication that the principal may not be.

It is a well-known canon of construction, "expressio unius, exclusio alterius," and therefore the expression of interest payable in coin, excludes the idea of the principal being so paid.

Again, in the face of the greenback note, it is provided that it shall be receivable for all debts, public and private, except for duties on imports and interest on the public debt. Language cannot be plainer. The principal of these bonds is neither duties on imports, nor interest on the public debt, and therefore not excepted. But hear Mr. Secretary Sherman again:

Duties on imported goods and interest on the public debt are excepted from the legal-tender clause. This implies that the principal of the debt is not excepted.

And in a published letter of his in 1868 he sets the seal of his condemnation on the false cry of repudiation in this emphatic language:

Your idea that we propose to repudiate or violate a promise when we offer to redeem the principal in legal-tenders is erroneous. I think the bondholder violates his promise when he refuses to take the same kind of money he paid for the bonds.

The bondholder "violates his promise when he refuses to take" greenbacks. "Let him put that in his pipe and smoke it." Do not call me a repudiationist when I vote as John Sherman spoke.

Ah, but it is said previous Government loans, payable in dollars, were paid in gold, therefore these bondholders had a right to expect the same. I call on Mr. Sherman again to answer this special pleading. It may be unpleasant for him to do it, in view of his present intimate friendship for bankers who hold these bonds, but he must do it. In the Senate in 1867 he said:

The construction drawn from the payment of previous loans in gold is answered by the fact that the act under which the loan was issued expressly declares—expressly declares that a note shall be lawful money as well as gold, and shall be receivable in payment of public debts.

He says, "in payment of public debts;" and the bond is "a public debt."

There is, there can be, there ought to be, no escape from this inexorable logic, and never shall be by my vote. Nearly fifteen hundred millions of bonds were legislated by a republican Congress out of this dilemma by the cruel refunding act of July 17, 1870, and these $270,000,000 are all that were left "out in the cold," and the bill now before us proposes, by its provisions, to take them into the ark of a "safe deposit," as old Noah's hand took in the wearied dove.

Now, if you pay off these with greenbacks, the figures will then stand:

Amount, after deducting idle money in the Treasury,
in round numbers	$614,000,000
Pay in greenbacks, and deduct	270,000,000
Leaving balance	344,000,000

But where will you get the greenbacks? Print them. Print them, if need be, on the same presses you printed the bonds. When I say this, I am set down by the bondholder as a lunatic, and am answered that a statute on the books prohibits a larger issue than $346,000,000 in greenbacks. Then modify the law. The Congress which passed that law cannot bind this Congress. The very authority to issue by this Congress, ipso facto, modifies the prior law. But to issue greenbacks is unconstitutional, they say. The Congress of 1861 did not think so. The Supreme Court, the tribunal of last resort, says differently, and the memories of other days, at least, which cluster around that august tribunal entitle it to some attention. "They have decided the act constitutional as a war measure," I am told, the decision does not say so. If it did, the bonds were war bonds and until they are liquidated the war necessity exists. Both were born amid the same scenes, rocked in the same cradle, together attained manhood, and arm in arm should descend the western slope, and lie down in the same grave.

Indeed, it might be argued (I merely suggest, without indorsing such an argument) that it would be unconstitutional for Congress to prohibit by statute the issuance of enough greenbacks to pay these bonds. The fourteenth amendment declares, the validity of the bonds shall not be questioned. If the "validity" of a debt is "questioned," by the debtor placing himself, voluntarily in a condition in which he cannot pay, the case might arise, when these bonds matured, that the bondholder could say, "pay me my debt." If the Government should reply, "I have no gold or silver with which to pay you, and my law forbids me to issue greenbacks," why could not the bondholder reply, "your fundamental law forbids you from impairing my rights, and the very law authorizing my bonds recognized your power to issue greenbacks to pay them; under that law you issued them, which you have subsequently destroyed; I demand their reissue, that I may be paid?" If he has any logic in his demand, then the creditor has no right to demand a currency which the debtor has not equal right to force him to take. There may, or may not, be reason in this position. It occurs to me in passing, and I mention it. I stand on the decision as it is.

It is objected, even if we have the power, that $270,000,000 would inflate the currency, force a redundancy, destroy values, and would be vicious financial legislation. Of course it would inflate to that extent, but it is quite another question whether that amount would create a redundancy, in view of the fact that England has a per capita circulating medium, of about $20, and France has about $35 per capita, with a smiling prosperity blessing her people, while the United States has only about $17 per capita, and boundless forests, prairies, and mines to be developed.

Now, I know that wise financiers assert, that in England and the United States, bills of exchange, checks, and commercial devices, operate to increase their circulating medium, to a parity per capita with that of France, where such devices are not used to any appreciable extent. However that may be, these European countries cover small areas of territory, have dense populations, commercial facilities are on every hand, while the United States have vast areas of thinly populated sections, remote from banks, bills of exchange, and the like. Mines and agricultural fields are on every hand, needing only capital to turn them into enormous national wealth. But inviting as they may be, enterprise and labor sit disconsolate and paralyzed, with piteous, pleading eyes to Wall street, which riots in speculation and revels in cent. per cent. on blocks of stocks, and gilt-edged bonds. The volume of the currency is so completely within the control of the Vanderbilts, and Keenes, and Jay Goulds, and John Shermans, that they expand or contract it as they become bulls or bears. Bulls to toss the unwary into bankruptcy, and bears to squeeze the life out of labor.

But if you are afraid of inflation, gentlemen, substitute this $270,000,000 for national-bank notes, and stop the interest on the bonds on which they are based. What do you say to that? That will not increase the currency. I am after stopping the interest on that amount of bonds; an interest of $9,450,000 per annum at 3½ per cent. Give me your answer. Ah, you want the banks to furnish an adjustable volume, in accordance with the demands of trade, "the law of supply and demand." Well, let us see; we have $346,000,000 of greenbacks, about $360,000,000 of national-bank notes, making $706,000,000 in all. You say that is right. Add these $270,000,000 to the greenbacks and we have $616,000,000, leaving $90,000,000 margin for the banks to adjust with. You certainly do not desire to bring the whole down to $616,000,000; if not, you still have an adjusting leverage. You therefore have no excuse. The only aim is to give the money power into the hands of the bankers and money men, to aggrandize themselves and their children, at the expense of the toiling men and women of the country; and Congress is confidently relied on to furnish immunity to the plunderers by nefarious and heartless legislation. Well, it may do it, and likely will, but when it does it will add another chapter to the great crime of cruel legislation, which may rejoice the heart of money lords and ladies, but will not be forgotten, or forgiven, by the outraged victims, "neither in this world nor the world to come."

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] admits that we can pay $200,000,000 in ten years out of the ordinary revenues. Deduct that amount from $344,000,000, the amount left, if my views are adopted, and we have only $144,000,000 remaining. What shall be done with that sum? I think the ordinary surplus revenue, with any economy, would pay that sum in ten years, too. But suppose not; the sums which I have shown can be paid amount to $420,000,000; this at 3½ per cent. interest amounts to $14,700,000, which sum can be annually appropriated to the payment of this remainder, and in ten years the whole sum will be wiped out. And instead of paying annually $19,040,000 on $544,000,000 for ten years, and owing the principal at the end of that time, we can be rid of it forever.

Mr. Chairman, I have discussed this question at far greater length than I intended. Indeed I expected to indulge mainly in general reflections, but the interest attaching to the consideration of these figures has led me on unconsciously. I would now desist but for a proposition asserted by the distinguished gentleman who fathers this bill, which demands a moment's attention, as I think it is the real honest reason for refunding these bonds at all. We are told by him:

As the country grows richer, which it is now doing to an unparalleled extent, the demand for registered bonds will become so great that the total remaining debt will not be large enough to meet the requirements for this purpose alone.

This sounds to my ears like a very strange doctrine. To say the least, it is a candid confession of capitalists. But it is entirely in keeping with their theory of legislation that Congress should provide a "safe deposit," "permanent in its character," where rich men can place their money, have it free from all taxation, and its interest payable as certainly as the Government shall stand. I deny that we should provide, by legislation, for such "safe deposits" where capital has no risks. Such places should be broken up, as fast as it can be honestly and honorably done, that the surplus money of the rich, like the penny of the poor man, shall be driven out into the channels of industry, to infuse life into enterprise and trade, to take its share of risk, in developing the unbounded resources of the country, and sharing in the burdens of government. If the capitalist is unwilling to risk his money in the enterprises of skill and labor, let him live on his principal, and not suck subsistence from the effort and toil of other men. The "debt will not be large enough to meet" such demand, indeed! And I suppose the representatives of the people must satisfy such a demand by providing registered bonds to be paid by the people! I am against such a doctrine, now and forever.

Mr. Chairman, for twenty years there has been an unbroken line of financial legislation in favor of wealth; look one time, gentlemen, to the claim of the poor. It is the "poor in spirit" who are promised the kingdom of Heaven; you seem to think that the poor in body must, also, expect relief only beyond the grave.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. COVERT reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 4592) to facilitate the refunding of the national debt, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HALL, for two days, on account of important business.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

I commend the subject of these petitions to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. These citizens all live in the northern portion of Illinois, and are engaged in the production of butter, and they believe that this subject should receive the consideration of Congress. Whether it is proper to do so or not, I hope that the Committee on Agriculture will make a report on the subject at an early day. I move that the petitions be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I present a resolve of the Legislature of Massachusetts relating to the jurisdiction of courts of the United States over municipal corporations. I send it to the desk to be read.

The resolution was read, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

In the year 1880. Resolution relating to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over municipal corporations.

Resolved, That whereas it has been proposed in the Congress of the United States to repeal the existing laws conferring jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States in suits brought by the municipal corporations, citizens of one State against citizens of another State, and also in suits brought by individual citizens of one State against municipal corporations composed of citizens of another State; and

Whereas joint resolutions have been adopted by some of the States of this Union requesting their Senators and Representatives in Congress to urge the enactment of such laws as may be necessary to prevent the exercise of jurisdiction by the courts of the United States in proceedings by mandamus against municipal corporations in the several States to compel the levy and collection of taxes wherewith to satisfy judgments rendered by such courts: it is declared to be the deliberate judgment of this Legislature:

That the laws passed by Congress under the Constitution of the United States conferring jurisdiction upon the courts of the United States in controversies between citizens of different States, to the end that justice may be administered free from the influence of local interests and prejudices, are wise enactments and ought to be preserved in their integrity.

That municipal corporations, being composed of individual citizens, and having power to contract obligations with other corporations and with individual citizens in the several States in this Union, there exists no reason for making any discrimination between them and individual citizens, so far as it regards the exercise of jurisdiction by the courts of the United States.

That enactments annulling or impairing the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States so far as relates to past contracts are abhorrent to natural justice, since they deprive parties of important remedies for enforcing such contracts, to which they were entitled, and upon which they relied in making such contracts.

That municipal corporations being composed of individual citizens, and having power to make contracts with other citizens, to hold them amenable to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, upon writs of mandamus issued to compel the levy and collection of taxes wherewith to satisfy judgments rendered by such courts, is not an interference with State rights, since in such cases such courts do not seek to control the officers of such corporations in the discharge of their duty as State officers, but simply as trustees invested with a power in trust to be exercised for the benefit of creditors entitled by contract to the execution of such powers. And his excellency the governor is hereby requested to transmit a copy of this resolution, with the preamble, to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress for their earnest consideration and action.

House of representatives, March 3, 1880, passed; sent up for concurrence.

GEO. A. MARDEN, Clerk.

Senate, March 8, 1880, concurred.

S. N. GIFFORD, Clerk.

Mr. BLAIR presented the petition of the Exeter (New Hampshire) Woman's Christian Temperance Union, officially signed, and also the petition of citizens of Dover and Nashua, New Hampshire, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PADDOCK presented the petition of numerous citizens residing in the Niobrara Valley, Nebraska, praying that the United States grant to each male Indian one hundred and sixty acres of land, with the necessary stock and agricultural implements; that the Indian tribes be placed under the protection of the laws of the United States and made amenable thereto, and also that they be placed under the management of the War Department; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WINDOM. I present the petition of W. H. Campbell and 52 other route agents in the employ of the postal service of the United States, praying Congress for the passage of an act authorizing a reclassification of the employes in that branch of the railway mail service. They state numerous facts showing the inequality of the present classification, and give reasons why it should be reconstructed and changed and the salaries of all those employes increased. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

He also presented the petition of numerous citizens of Kentucky, members of the Legislature of that State, praying for the erection by the Federal Government at Paducah, in that State, of a suitable building to be used for a court-house, post-office, and custom-house; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition numerous signed by merchants and manufacturers of Davenport, Iowa, praying for the passage of a national bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present the petition of the Saint Joseph Daily Gazette, a leading democratic paper of Northwest Missouri, the Saint Joseph Herald, a leading republican paper, and the Saint Joseph Daily News, praying a reduction of the duty on certain articles used in the manufacture of paper. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of William H. Harrison, of Virginia, praying that his claim for compensation for the use and occupancy of his property by the United States troops during the late war be referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication, reported adversely thereon, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 724) referring the claim of John W. Robinson, of Hinds County, Mississippi, to the Court of Claims, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 808) to secure service of process in United States courts in certain cases, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. THURMAN. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 688) to provide for the appointment of a marshal for the middle district of Alabama and a district attorney for the northern district of Alabama, to report it adversely. As the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] who introduced the bill is not in his seat, I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. I am instructed by the same committee, to which was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Nebraska in favor of such legislation as will forever prohibit the payment of Southern war claims, to report it to the Senate with the statement that the resolution is in the precise form of two other resolutions that have been received by the Senate and which the Senate has decided are not the proper subjects of reference to a committee. It is a simple resolution of instruction to the Senators and Representatives from that State. The committee ask to be discharged from its consideration, and that it be laid on the table.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 12) to authorize the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, respectively, to commence and prosecute suits against the United States in the Supreme Court of the United States, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 708) to authorize the State of Illinois to commence and prosecute suits against the United States in the Supreme Court of the United States, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 319) for the relief of Robert Habersham, George Patten, and John L. Villalonga, or their executors or administrators, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not know anything about the bill, but I think it had better go on the Calendar.

Mr. McDONALD. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. McDONALD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 320) for the relief of William Battersby, reported adversely thereon; and it was postponed indefinitely.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the printing of 10,000 copies of the second report of the United States entomological commission on the Rocky Mountain locust and other injurious insects; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The bill which has just come from the House relating to the public printing being one requiring immediate attention, I ask that it be referred at this time to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will lay before the Senate both bills for reference.

The bill (H. R. No. 4924) making appropriations to supply certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes; and the bill (H. R. No. 5258) appropriating money providing for the public printing, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I am instructed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to report the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That, according to the evidence now known to the Senate, WILLIAM P. KELLOGG was not chosen by the Legislature of Louisiana to the seat in the Senate for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, 1877, and is not entitled to sit in the same.

2. Resolved, That Henry M. Spofford was chosen by the Legislature of Louisiana to the seat in the Senate for the term beginning on the 4th of March, 1877, and that he be admitted to the same on taking the oath prescribed by law.

I am also instructed by the same committee to submit a report in support of the resolutions. I ask that it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed under the rule.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. A minority report I understand is to be made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. I am instructed by the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to submit their views in writing. They are very brief, only about ten sentences, and I desire to have them read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They will be reported.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have no objection to the reading of the minority report, but I suppose if one is read the other should be read also.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will do as he pleases about that, of course. I desire to have mine read if the Clerk will read it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have no objection myself to the reading of both reports; but I think if one report is read and goes into the RECORD, the other should accompany it.

Mr. EATON. The majority report had better be read first.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The majority report should be read first, and the other afterward.

Mr. HOAR. As my report is now presented, the disposition I asked should be made of it first.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have a motion to make in relation to both reports. It was understood that the majority and minority reports should go together.

Mr. HOAR. I have now the floor. I desired to submit the views of the minority. I did submit them and ask to have them read. If the Senate wants to have them both read, it can so order.

Mr. CONKLING, (to Mr. HOAR.) Why not read the views of the minority yourself? You have that right.

Mr. HOAR. I will read them myself. The views of the minority are as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned, a minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Henry M. Spofford, claiming the seat now occupied by WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG, submit the following as their views:

On the 30th day of November, 1877, the Senate passed the following resolutions: "Resolved, That WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG is, upon the merits of the case, entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1877, and that he be admitted thereto on taking the proper oath."

"Resolved, That Henry M. Spofford is not entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States."

The party majority in the Senate has changed since Mr. KELLOGG took the oath of office in pursuance of the above resolution. Nothing else has changed. The facts which the Senate considered and determined were in existence then as now. It is sought, by mere superiority of numbers, for the first time to thrust a Senator from the seat which he holds by virtue of the express and deliberate final judgment of the Senate.

The act which is demanded of this party majority would be, in our judgment, a great public crime. It will be, if consummated, one of the great political crimes in American history, to be classed with the rebellion, with the attempt to take possession by fraud of the State government in Maine, and with the overthrow of State governments in the South, of which it is the fitting sequence. Political parties have too often been led by partisan zeal into measures which a sober judgment might disapprove; but they have ever respected the constitution of the Senate.

The men whose professions of returning loyalty to the Constitution have been trusted by the generous confidence of the American people are now to give evidence of the sincerity of their vows. The people will thoroughly understand this matter, and will not be likely to be deceived again.

We do not think proper to enter here upon a discussion of the evidence by which the claimant of Mr. KELLOGG's seat seeks to establish charges affecting the integrity of that Senator. Such evidence can be found in abundance in the slums of great cities. It is not fit to be trusted in cases affecting the smallest amount of property, much less the honor of an eminent citizen, or the title to an object of so much desire as a seat in the Senate. This evidence is not only unworthy of respect or credit, but it is in many instances wholly irreconcilable with undisputed facts, and Mr. KELLOGG has met and overthrown it at every point.

GEORGE F. HOAR.
ANGUS CAMERON.
JOHN A. LOGAN.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. As the Senator from Massachusetts has persisted in reading the report of the minority, I think it but due to the country that I should also read the report of the majority, so that the two reports may go into the RECORD together, because there is nothing the majority so much desire as a thorough comprehension of this whole case by the people of the United States, and that, indeed, is all we ask. I will, therefore, proceed to read as a part of my remarks the report of the committee.

It is as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to which was referred the memorial of Henry M. Spofford, claiming to be entitled to the seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana now occupied by WILLIAM P. KELLOGG, ask leave to submit the following report:

On the 7th day of November, 1876, an election was held in the State of Louisiana for a governor and members of the Legislature. In March, 1877, WILLIAM P. KELLOGG presented credentials signed by Stephen B. Packard, claiming to be governor, and certifying that said KELLOGG had been duly elected to the seat in the Senate for the term beginning on the 4th of March, 1877, by the Legislature chosen at said election. In October, 1877, Henry M. Spofford presented credentials signed by Francis T. Nicholls, claiming to be governor, and certifying that said Spofford had been duly elected to the same seat by the Legislature chosen at said election. These several credentials were referred by the Senate to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. On the 26th of November, 1877, a majority of the committee reported that the committee had investigated the issue, and that KELLOGG on the merits was entitled to the seat. A minority of the committee reported that the committee had not fully investigated the issue, but had refused to do so, and asked that the credentials of both contestants be recommitted with instructions to complete the investigation. The Senate refused to recommit, adopted the majority report, and KELLOGG was admitted to the seat on the 28th of November, 1877.

On the 21st day of March, 1879, Henry M. Spofford presented his memorial to the Senate, complaining that he was denied the privilege of producing important testimony on the former hearing, alleging that much evidence of bribery and corruption by said KELLOGG in procuring his pretended election had been since discovered, and asking that the case "be re-examined, to the end that justice may be done."

This memorial was referred to this committee, and the Senate, subsequently to that reference, ordered and authorized the committee to take testimony by the whole committee or by sub-committee, with full power to send for persons and papers, and to do all things necessary and usual in such cases.

The committee have faithfully executed this order of the Senate.

The memorialist and the sitting member appeared before the committee in person and by counsel. On the 5th of June, 1879, the full committee commenced the examination of witnesses in this city. The examination was continued in November and December by a sub-committee in the city of New Orleans, and was again resumed by the full committee in this city, and was continued until both parties announced they had no further testimony to offer. Nearly one hundred and fifty witnesses have been examined, and over twelve hundred printed pages of testimony have been taken and are herewith reported to the Senate, with the conclusions of law and fact at which the committee have arrived.

In the opinion of your committee the evidence now for the first time fully taken clearly and abundantly establishes the following facts:

I. That said WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG, then holding the office of governor of the State of Louisiana and pending the canvass in said election of 1876, did conspire with divers persons, and in aid of such conspiracy did fraudulently use the influence and power of his office of governor, to prevent a fair, free, and legal election in said State, to the end that he might procure from the commissioners of election the return of a Legislature a majority of whose members should be of the republican party and presumed to be favorable to his election to the Senate.

II. That, having failed in this, said WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG, still holding the office of governor, did conspire with divers persons, and in aid of such conspiracy did fraudulently use the influence and power of his office of governor, to change the result as returned by the commissioners of election, to the end that he might procure through false certificates of election the organization of a pretended Legislature a majority of whose members should be of the republican party and supposed to be favorable to his election to the Senate.

III. That said WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG did conspire with divers others to prevent, and by force, through the Metropolitan police, aided of the Army of the United States, did prevent, the lawfully elected members of the Legislature, and especially those of the democratic party, from assembling in the halls of the senate and house of representatives in the State-house of the said State of Louisiana; and did, by threats, by the use of money, by the promise of offices, and by other corrupt practices, compel and induce to assemble in said halls, respectively, a mob of his co-conspirators against the will of the people of Louisiana, many of whom had not been elected, and some of whom had been neither elected nor certified, to the end that he might procure a pretended Legislature for the inauguration of Stephen B. Packard as governor, who, he well knew, had not been elected, and from which mob he might procure the form of his own election to the Senate, and which pretended election he knew such pretended governor would certify.

IV. That said WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG having thus corruptly procured the assembling of a body of persons pretending to be a Legislature, in which were included persons not elected, and from which had been forcibly excluded persons who had been elected and certified as members, did, by bribery, by the use of money and the promise of offices, and by other corrupt practices, induce said body of persons to go through the form of choosing him to a seat in the Senate of the United States.

V. That said WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG, well knowing that the facts now proven to exist did exist, did falsely represent that no such facts existed or could be proven, seeking thereby to induce a majority of the committee, without taking the evidence which has now been taken, to make a report declaring his title to the seat, and with intent to induce a majority of the Senate to admit him to the seat so fraudulently claimed.

VI. That to prevent the discovery of the bribes, frauds, and corruptions now proven to exist the said WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG did procure a large number of the persons comprising said pretended Legislature to be appointed to public offices of profit in the custom-house at New Orleans and elsewhere as inducement not to disclose the truth. That after other persons, officers and members of said pretended Legislature, had freely and voluntarily admitted under oath their knowledge of said bribes and corruptions, and had been summoned to appear as witnesses before your committee and were under the protection of the Senate, said WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG did, by bribery and corrupt practices, induce such witnesses to testify falsely that they had not made such admissions, or that if they had made them they were not true.

The committee realize the severity of these conclusions, but they are more than justified by the evidence. In view of their severe character, however, the committee are unwilling to confine this report to a simple announcement of their findings, but will incorporate in the report itself a portion of the abundant evidence which establishes their correctness.

As illustrative of the evidence in support of the first conclusion before stated your committee will here refer to the following facts:

1. In 1876 F. J. Stokes was the parish judge of Grant Parish, appointed by KELLOGG. One Ward was the supervisor of registration for said parish, also appointed by KELLOGG. Before the registration was completed Ward hid his books and came to New Orleans and represented to KELLOGG that he "was bulldozed and driven from the parish." KELLOGG asked Stokes how the parish was. Stokes replied that "whenever the people of the parish was voting the democrats carried the parish." KELLOGG said, "If the people there don't want an election we will throw the parish out."

Stokes testifies most positively that the bulldozing pretext was false, and that the whole thing was fixed up to throw the parish out because it was democratic. He says "there was no bulldozing there at all."

In answer to the direct question, "Was there any real danger to him (Ward) in staying there, (in the parish)," Stokes said, "not a solitary particle; there was no danger to any man in the parish, if he staid there and behaved himself. They treated him (Ward) very quietly and nicely as long as he staid in the hill country, and they paid his bills up there in the hill country." The hill country was the strong democratic portion of the parish.

Evidently to make a case of apparent fairness for the sitting member, Jewett testified that "KELLOGG handed him a letter directing Ward to return to the parish." This letter he gave to Ward "about the 1st of November." In reply to this Judge Stokes testified that "he (Ward) never started back. It was no calculation to have him start. In the first place to have started on the 1st of November he could not have gotten there. He told KELLOGG at the time that the only way to the mouth of Red River was to take a stage." "He (Ward) actually did not go back." One fact puts the truth of this evidence of Stokes beyond possible doubt. Ward was allowed to remain in New Orleans until after the time for completing the registration under the law had expired, and then the pretended order to return was given him.

Thus defrauded, the people of the parish held an election without registration, and the democrats carried the parish but it "was thrown out."

2. By the election laws of Louisiana the registration of voters was required to be completed nine days before the election. The law also required that when the registration was closed the books of registration from the several parishes should be sent to the chief registrar's office in New Orleans.

In this election of 1876 the books of registration, at least of the several wards in the city of New Orleans, were sent to the custom-house instead of to the office of the chief registrar. Peter Williams was the chief clerk and acting registrar of voters in 1876. Without his knowledge or consent an order by telegraph was sent out to the supervisors of registration in his name ordering the books to be sent to the custom-house. To this order the name of Williams was forged by Blanchard, KELLOGG's clerk. Williams adds, "In the morning when I came to the office I expected to find the books there, but I did not, and I went down then to the custom-house and found the books there, and found them erasing names from them."

"Q. Who were erasing the names?"

"A. The supervisors and their clerks."

"Q. That was at the custom-house?"

"A. At the custom-house, sir."

There is no denial by any one of this bold and shameless fraud and forgery. It is shown by various witnesses that the "supervisors and their clerks" were erasing names from these registration books during the night, and that a large number was erased, chiefly of democrats. One of the republican candidates for the Legislature from the Seventh ward of New Orleans (Moore) himself struck off "a large number of registered democratic voters."

As illustrative of the evidence which shows the correctness of the second conclusion announced above, the following facts are cited:

1. Henry Houser was a member of the Metropolitan police force, and was stationed as the night watch at Governor KELLOGG's house. A few days after the election he saw Blanchard, Jewett, Anderson, and Packard frequently at KELLOGG's house at night. They often entered from the rear way. Witness frequently saw Blanchard and Jewett writing in one of the rooms up stairs. They would come about seven or eight o'clock and remain from eleven to twelve. They had papers which looked like election papers. He heard KELLOGG concede that the election for the house of representatives had gone democratic, and Blanchard told witness they were working on the election returns, and his understanding from them was that they were seeking, by throwing out parishes and working on the returns, to change the result and make it republican. They were thus engaged until after Packard's inauguration. This witness is strongly corroborated in several particulars, not only by conceded facts but also by the witnesses called to rebut his testimony.

2. There can now be no reasonable doubt that the scheme to reverse the verdict of the ballot-box was hatched at these clandestine night meetings at KELLOGG's own house, and the plan for carrying out the scheme under the false pretext of violence and intimidation was here begun by these conspirators, of whom KELLOGG was the chief. The frauds resorted to to change the result of the election in the Seventh ward of New Orleans are now for the first time fully disclosed. This result, changing three votes from the democrats to the republicans in the house, must be added to the many heretofore known and admitted.

"The returns from the parishes showed that Nicholls, the democratic candidate for governor, had a majority over Packard, the republican candidate for the same office, of 8,010 votes. By the exercise of the unlawful powers already pointed out and by the frauds now proven, this majority was changed to a majority in favor of Packard of 3,426 votes."

"The evidence shows, and it is admitted by Mr. KELLOGG, that Perkins, democrat, had a majority for senator in the twelfth senatorial district; he beat Weber, republican, largely, but the returning board gave the latter a certificate of election. Meredith, democrat, had a majority over Hamlet, republican, for the senate, for the eighteenth senatorial district; the returning board gave Hamlet the certificate. Sandford, democrat, beat Blunt, republican, for the senate, in the twenty-second senatorial district; the returning board gave Blunt the certificate."

"In Ouachita Parish Preard and Taylor, democrats, beat Barrington and Brewster, republicans, for the house of representatives, as the parish returns show, but the returning board gave the republicans certificates of election. In East Baton Rouge Parish Du Pré, Williams, and Young, democrats, beat Bird, Holt, and Lane, republicans, for the house of representatives; the returning board gave the certificates of election to the republicans. In La Fayette Parish Marshall T. Martin, democrat, beat Fernest Martin, republican (these were brothers) for the house of representatives; the republican received the certificate of election."

"In West Feliciana Parish McGee and Ryland, democrats, beat Swazie and Early, republicans, for the house of representatives; the republicans, however, received certificates of election. In Morehouse Parish Washburn and Hammond, democrats, beat Shelton and Blair, republicans, for the house of representatives, but the certificates of election were given to the republicans. In De Soto Parish, Pitts and Means, democrats, beat Long and Johnston, republicans; the latter received certificates of election. The returning board refused to count any returns from the parishes of Grant and East Feliciana; the returns were thrown out absolutely. The parish returns show that Lyons and Porter, democrats, were elected from East Feliciana, and Randolph, democrat, was elected from Grant Parish."

"The parish returns show that the democrats were elected in each instance above mentioned, and Mr. KELLOGG admits that they received majorities. (See his statement made to the committee on 13th of November, 1877.)"

Of the eighty-three persons who were said to be in the joint convention which elected KELLOGG nineteen are positively shown not to have been elected, but were fraudulently given certificates. Seventy-nine were necessary to make a quorum. The "work on the election returns" at KELLOGG's house was evidently effective, and bore fruit through the returning boards, one and sometimes two of whose members attended these clandestine night meetings. Mr. Stevens, a member of the Nicholls senate, was seized and held by force and was counted as present against his protest, to enable this Packard senate to go through the farce of a contest and to seat two outsiders named Baker and Kelso, who were not elected by the people.

The evidence in support of the third conclusion is furnished by the witnesses of both contestants. It is easy to understand that such a body of men so fraudulently assembled could not be kept together by a sense of duty or other legitimate means. Accordingly the state-house which they had seized and in which they were gathered was barricaded and surrounded with troops and the members were kept in their halls day and night. Orders were given by the pretended officers of the Legislature, and especially on the day of election, to keep members present by force. Some who were absent in spite of these precautions were fraudulently personated as present, and others were allowed to record their votes the next day. But many of the members were impecunious. "They needed money to meet their necessities; they had to live and wanted to be helped from time to time as their money gave out." Louis J. Souer, who figures prominently in all these frauds in behalf of KELLOGG, and who was a member of the lower house, advanced "out of his own money" about $3,000, much of which he admits was never returned. John A. Walsh and other accommodating witnesses and friends of KELLOGG also advanced money. These advances were called loans made on warrants or vouchers. It is impossible to mistake the meaning of such testimony. What Souer calls loans are spoken of by other witnesses very differently, who say these advances were bribes, but they were to be called loans if any question should arise about their character. The testimony given by the witnesses introduced by KELLOGG himself is overwhelmingly convincing that force, fraud, and bribery were all needed to keep this motley crowd of conspirators against the people of Louisiana in their barricaded den of iniquity.

In support of the fourth conclusion the evidence is equally convincing, for after all these frauds to cheat the voters, to change the returns, and to force an assemblage, KELLOGG was in danger of losing the prize. Warmoth testifies: "There was a bitter fight for the Senatorship, not so much on my part, although I was spoken of, but between KELLOGG and Pinchback." The witness himself "was a dark horse," thinking may be neither could be elected, and the honors would fall on him. "My eyes," he adds, "were not altogether blind to that contingency." Even after KELLOGG was nominated he thought it was absolutely necessary for him to get all the votes in order to be admitted to the seat.

Thus both to secure the nomination and the election the field for bribery and other corrupt practices was enlarged. KELLOGG now added threats also. He declared if he was not elected he would disband the concern and turn them all over to the Nicholls government!

Quite a number of witnesses have testified directly and positively that they saw KELLOGG pay money to different members to vote for him for Senator.

A large number are shown to have admitted they received money for voting for KELLOGG, and many of these admissions were made under oaths taken voluntarily and without inducement. The evidence establishing direct bribery, with money, of a large number of the members is simply crushing. If a tithe of this evidence is credible there can be no escape from the conclusion that KELLOGG secured his election by direct and unblushing bribery. Offices under the Federal Administration were also promised to secure the same result, and how faithfully these promises were fulfilled is unmistakably disclosed in the evidence.

The evidence referred to in support of the four first conclusions before announced can leave no doubt in any rational mind of the correctness of the fifth conclusion, as to the reasons which urged the sitting member so earnestly to oppose a full investigation on the former hearing of this case. If such investigation had been made, as it was once ordered by the Senate and resolved by the committee, and the evidence now before us had been taken, it would be doing violence to all possible respect for the United States Senate to suppose the sitting member could have been declared entitled "on the merits" to take a seat in this body. It was indispensably necessary to conceal the facts to discover any merit in his title.

In support of the sixth conclusion the evidence is, if possible, still more convincing.

On the 5th day of May last, the Senate directed this committee to investigate the charges made by the memorialist. It is significant that this order was adopted by the Senate only after the most earnest and persistent opposition from the sitting member himself. The passage of this order by the Senate to take testimony dates the beginning of efforts by the sitting member and his assistants to suppress evidence, which your committee believe were never exceeded in energy and varied devices.

The following special dispatches from Washington City appeared in the Times newspaper, of New Orleans, on the 13th and 16th days of May, respectively:

"WASHINGTON, May 12, 1879.

"In view of the interest the leading republicans and the administration take in the result of the contest for KELLOGG's seat, it is certain that any republican who can be shown to have worked against him at home will stand a slim chance of any recognition from Hayes, or the next administration if it be republican. KELLOGG is playing his hand for all it is worth, and don't intend to have any fire in the rear if he can help it."

"W. H. R."

"WASHINGTON, May 15, 1879.

"Everything is not lovely in republican circles in Louisiana, in fact, quite the reverse. There are said to be some people in the party who are not helping the Hon. WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG as they ought, and one of them holds a high position in the custom-house."

"The party and the President are both rallying to the assistance of the Hon. W. P. KELLOGG with some solidity, and the republican in Louisiana who refuses to actively aid in this contest may make up his mind to go to the rear if KELLOGG wins or the next administration is republican."

"Hon. John Sherman and Attorney-General Devens have signified their willingness to aid KELLOGG in this contest all they can, and some of the custom-house rolls are very likely to be revised pretty soon."

"W. H. R."

There can be no doubt as to the intent of this notice, and the evidence discloses with striking clearness the effect. It should be remembered, in this connection, that the frauds which were to be investigated could only, in their nature, be proven by those who were either members or officers of the pretended Packard legislature, and by those who were permitted to have free access to it, and by others who were in KELLOGG's confidence at the time the frauds were committed. All others were excluded by bayonets from this barricaded mock legislature thus conspiring to defraud the people its members pretended to represent. They were plainly notified of the consequences which they must expect, both from this Administration and the next, who would dare reveal what they knew of these frauds or who failed actively to prevent such revelation.

The rewards were as unstinted as the threats were positive. The examination by this committee began the 5th of June. During this month of June there were thirty-nine of the members of this Packard mob of KELLOGG conspirators holding Federal offices, nearly all in the custom-house at New Orleans, which constituted about one-half the number claimed to be present at the time of KELLOGG's election. Thirty-nine so employed appear by the testimony before your committee. Other statements have been made to the public increasing the number of said Packard legislature so employed to fifty-six.

The object of these appointments is not left by the evidence to conjecture. The evidence is direct, positive, unimpeached, and undisputed that the object was to prevent revelations against KELLOGG.

H. T. Brown testified that Morris Marks (revenue collector, and who was one of KELLOGG's most active supporters) said to witness in June or July: "I cannot take care of any of my friends now while this fight is going on about KELLOGG. I have to appoint a set of G—d d— curs and hounds to keep them from squealing on KELLOGG."

Morris Marks was present during the investigation by the sub-committee in New Orleans, was actively at work for KELLOGG, was himself a witness in behalf of KELLOGG, and did not deny this statement of Mr. Brown.

Similar statements and allusions frequently occur in the evidence, and they are overwhelmingly corroborated by many facts. Witnesses were appointed to offices immediately before they were to testify, and were also appointed promptly after they had testified satisfactorily to KELLOGG. Witnesses who were clearly convicted of perjury and false swearing before this committee were appointed to places plainly as rewards for such perjury and false swearing. Witnesses who were proven to have made admissions that they knew KELLOGG was not elected, or that his election was corrupt, and threatened to reveal what they knew if they were not given offices, promptly received the offices, and as promptly testified that KELLOGG was elected, and by the fairest means possible! The instances of this use of the public offices to hush witnesses, to procure witnesses, and to reward witnesses are as numerous as they are disgraceful. Your committee do not believe such shameful civil-service degradation can be found in the annals of any civilized people. It is pregnant evidence of all the charges of fraud and corruption against the sitting member. It cannot be supposed that such means were employed to maintain a title which was good "on the merits." It cannot be doubted that such means were employed only to maintain a title which was secured by fraud, and which could only be retained by perjury. Your committee are not authorized to say, and will not say, that the President and certain of his Cabinet were willing parties to this corrupt use of the public offices, but they feel constrained to say that if they had been willing parties they could not have been more accommodating and compliant to the sitting member.

The evidence clearly reveals another very striking and unusual method of using the public offices. Those who held the offices were not only themselves faithful to their chief and his title "on the merits," in their own testimony, but they were active and vigilant to make others so. They ceased not to travel and labor in behalf of the sitting member, to the utter neglect of their public duties and without any cessation of their pay from the public Treasury.

Several members and officers of the body which pretended to elect KELLOGG admitted, as the evidence shows, voluntarily, that there was no quorum present, that absent members were falsely personated, that the roll as made up was false, and that KELLOGG had used bribery and corrupt means to secure his election. The memorialist, knowing the character of all these people who were parties to this enormous fraud, resorted to the natural precaution to have their statements reduced to writing and sworn to before venturing to summon them as witnesses. That such affidavits had been made, and that a number of those who made them had been or would be summoned to Washington as witnesses in behalf of the memorialist became known to the sitting member's vigilant sentinels in the custom-house. One employé of the custom-house came on to Washington in advance of the witnesses, among other things "to arrange with KELLOGG" for certain of the witnesses. A notorious detective also came on in advance and registered in this city under an assumed name. This detective testified that he was sent by an officer in the custom-house to watch the counsel of the memorialist, and to aid KELLOGG. Your committee do not rely on the character of this witness to establish his credit. His very service for KELLOGG was discrediting. Like most of the witnesses in this case he is only entitled to credit as his statements are corroborated, and many of his statements are most strikingly corroborated, and much that he said is shown by others to be true. The officer in the custom-house who is charged to have employed this detective was known to be very influential with the witnesses. He took the same train with the witnesses on their departure from New Orleans for this city. He traveled with them the entire distance; he exhorted the witnesses on the way to stand by their party; he telegraphed notice to KELLOGG of the time they would arrive in Washington; and he remained with them, ate with them, and slept with them until the examination here closed. It is shown, too, that from the time this investigation was ordered by the Senate until its close in this city an active telegraphic correspondence was going on between the sitting member and his assistant here and the collector of customs himself in New Orleans. The telegrams are in cipher and are herewith reported to the Senate. They most clearly relate to the witnesses and are pregnant with all the evidence of fraud, collusion, and corruption.

The witnesses arrived in Washington about ten o'clock p. m. on the 4th of June, and their examination by this committee was to commence the next morning. Whatever arrangements, therefore, were necessary to be made with or ratified by the sitting member, to induce them to deny the affidavits they had made in New Orleans, had to be completed during that night and before the meeting of this committee the ensuing morning. Accordingly the employés of the custom-house, and the detective who came in advance from New Orleans, and several others already in Washington in the Government's employ and KELLOGG's service, met the witnesses at the depot on their arrival. The detective swears that five of the witnesses were conducted by him, under previous arrangement, to KELLOGG's office after midnight. He says the witnesses were afraid of prosecution if they denied their sworn statements made in New Orleans, and that to relieve this fear some law was read to them to the effect that they could not be indicted for such denial. Being satisfied on this point the witnesses were willing to contract and the detective says did receive and accept from KELLOGG money and promises of offices during his senatorial term, and in consideration thereof did pledge themselves to disavow the memorialist who had called them as witnesses on the faith of their sworn statements, and to testify in all respects in favor of the sitting member. Thomas Murray did not attend this night conclave. He only of the witnesses was faithful to his statements made in New Orleans. He refused to accept the bribes offered him to do so. He and the detective both testified that such bribes were repeatedly urged upon him in increasing amounts. Refusing persistently to accept all offers to testify falsely, he was then offered money not to testify at all. He was urged to disobey the summons of this committee and escape into Canada where he was to be well maintained until the investigation was closed, and he should receive a telegram in the words "The Union forever" by which he was to understand he could safely return. All these offers he refused and did appear and testify, under the frowns of his comrades, to the truth of his previous statements.

Another witness, Milton Jones, accepted the bribe but hesitated to commit the perjury. In his stress he begged the counsel of the memorialist not to require him to testify, because he would be compelled to swear falsely, under the influence of "big money." Because of this earnest appeal he was not sworn by the memorialist. This witness was asked by KELLOGG, through his faithful detective, to return the money—the price of the perjury he had thus avoided committing—but he refused to return it. Subsequently he was called by the sitting member before the sub-committee in New Orleans and made to execute his criminal bargain. Other devices were employed by the sitting member to suppress truth and establish falsehood. Those who refused to swear falsely were assailed as untrue to their party and social ostracism itself was visited upon them. Schemes were contrived to entrap them into inconsistent admissions. Witnesses who thought it legitimate to make and to swear to false statements were called to impeach the credibility of those who refused to imitate their example. Detectives were actively engaged, under friendly professions, in efforts to involve the memorialist in like bribes and frauds with those so abundantly proven upon the sitting member—all of which your committee cheerfully report not only failed, but recoiled heavily on the sitting member. Witnesses were diligently trained to believe that the election of KELLOGG from the Senate would be the defeat of the republican party in the nation and in Louisiana; that such defeat would render it impossible for any republicans to live in the State, and that perjury was a virtue when committed for the success of the republican party! All these facts and very many more of like kind will be found in the testimony herewith reported to the Senate.

That such is the testimony was not denied before your committee either by the sitting member or his able counsel. Indeed, it could not be denied without denying the plain language of very many witnesses. But it was earnestly insisted before your committee by both the sitting member and his counsel that this testimony would not justify the conclusion that the sitting member was not entitled to the seat in the Senate for two reasons; and first because, they alleged, the witnesses ought not to be believed.

Two grounds are urged for disbelieving the witnesses, (1) because they were contradicted, and (2) because they were impeached as not entitled to credit on account of bad character.

The contradictions were almost exclusively by witnesses who were parties to the crimes proven. To illustrate: If a witness testified positively that he saw money paid to a member for his vote, the implicated member was called to contradict this by testifying he did not receive money for his vote. Under this rule few criminals would be found guilty. It frequently happened, too, that the implicated member had previously and frequently admitted, and often under oath, that he did receive money for his vote. So he contradicted himself as well as the witnesses. It will be seen from the evidence, too, that these contradicting witnesses had often been provided with offices or other consideration after they made the admissions they were called to contradict, and others were promptly appointed to offices in the ever-accommodating custom-house after they had faithfully made the contradictions.

Your committee attach little, if any, weight to such contradictions. In our view they are often strangely confirmatory of the witnesses in chief.

Besides, many of the material frauds proven are not disputed at all, and some are even admitted, because they were of a character which did not admit of contradiction. This is especially true of the frauds resorted to to prevent a fair election by the people—to change the result as returned by the commissioners of election, and the force and frauds employed to assemble and keep together the pretended Packard legislature.

Let us then proceed to consider the allegation that the testimony should not be believed because the witnesses were impeached on account of general bad character. Some few of the witnesses were not so impeached at all, and why they were not impeached your committee do not understand, since the impeaching resources of the sitting member seemed to be exhaustless. As it is, however, the testimony which is unimpeached and uncontradicted is ample, not only to justify but to require the adoption of the resolutions herewith submitted. But your committee do not find it necessary to rest their conclusions solely on this unimpeached and uncontradicted evidence.

We admit that a great number of the witnesses called on both sides were of very bad character, not only for truth but for any other virtue, and if their credibility depended solely upon character they ought not to be believed. But the rules of law furnish safe guides in weighing this evidence.

The accomplice of a criminal is necessarily of bad character, for he is a criminal himself. If he is not to be believed because he is an accomplice, and therefore of bad character, then an accomplice in no case ought to be allowed to testify. But in spite of bad characters they are often the only accessible witnesses and their evidence is often most satisfactory. Were it otherwise, those criminals would often be safest whose crimes were greatest.

In the case before us nearly all the witnesses examined were the accomplices of KELLOGG in the crimes and frauds which resulted in his pretended election to the Senate. They were all conspirators against the people of Louisiana. The very fact that they were criminals and accomplices in this conspiracy furnished the most conclusive proof of bad character. No other proof was needed to establish such bad character. The conspirators were surrounded with troops by order of their chief—KELLOGG himself—by his power as governor, and the Army was employed to protect them day and night from intrusion by people worthy of credit by reason of good character. Being faithless in their very assembling to all good people, the chief chance of redress for good people was in the natural hope they would become faithless to each other, and reveal the frauds, bribes, and corruptions which cemented them for evil. These revelations appear in the evidence, and your committee do not doubt would far more abundantly appear if the Federal Administration would withdraw the patronage which has purchased the silence and perjury of so many of the gang.

All the facts and circumstances of corroboration required by the rules of evidence to accompany the testimony of accomplices abundantly and most remarkably sustain the witnesses who testified to the frauds, bribes, and corrupt practices upon which we have based our conclusions, and the impeaching witnesses are themselves most strikingly discredited by such facts and circumstances. Indeed, your committee do not hesitate to affirm that much of the evidence must be believed because the corroborations which accompany and surround it make it impossible that it can be false.

The sitting member insisted upon conducting much of the examination in his own behalf, and this privilege was accorded him. In the style of his questions and the conduct of his cause he often exhibited most striking corroboration of the witnesses who were testifying of his guilt. The corroborations brought out by himself not only occurred in his cross-examinations of the witnesses called by the memorialist, but also in his examinations of witnesses called by himself to impeach or contradict the witnesses of the memorialist.

Your committee are unable to see how an impartial legal mind can read the evidence taken and doubt the guilt of the sitting member upon every charge which has been made against him, notwithstanding so many of the witnesses must be admitted to be disreputable.

But the sitting member through his very able counsel also insisted, with great earnestness and skill before your committee, that the Senate, at a former session, having "after and upon evidence going to the merits of the case" declared that KELLOGG was "upon the merits of the case entitled to the seat," this decision is final and conclusive, and cannot now be re-examined and reversed. This was the first and chief position on which the title of the sitting member was made to rest.

Your committee have fully considered the question thus presented, and cannot doubt the correctness of the conclusions at which they have arrived.

Stated in the light of the facts now known, and herewith reported to the Senate, this position would read thus: that though the sitting member was not in fact chosen by the Legislature of Louisiana, and though the body of men alleged to have elected him was assembled through fraud, was held together by force, and was controlled by bribery and corruption, and all this was accomplished by a conspiracy to defraud the State and people of Louisiana, of which conspiracy the sitting member was himself the chief, yet the Senate having decided in ignorance and by the suppression of these facts that the sitting member was entitled on the merits to the seat, the Senate is compelled to allow him to retain the seat, after full knowledge that every fact was assumed to exist when he was admitted is and was false and untrue. The reply to such a position is sufficiently furnished in the statement of the position itself. But your committee will not rest the argument here, and will consider it in the light of precedent and law. Counsel for the sitting member says:

"If, therefore, this committee and the Senate shall set aside this judgment on the merits, it will present to the country and the world a spectacle not seen before in the century of our national existence just closed."

We might justly reply to this that this case, in the facts now proven, already presents to the country and the world a spectacle not before seen in this century or any previous century of this or any other nation. We trust such a spectacle will never again be presented, and that it must not be, it ought to be now condemned by all men, and especially by this Senate. If it shall be understood that seats once procured in this body by any means, however false and fraudulent, which bad men may employ cannot be taken away, this Senate may soon be largely composed of members not chosen by the Legislatures of the States. Successful frauds will displace the positive requisition of the Constitution in the elections of Senators. A case without precedent cannot be decided by precedent. Fraud has certainly become a powerful agent in our politics, but we are not willing to admit it has yet become the supreme law, above review and beyond remedy. But while no case like this was ever before presented for decision, yet principles have been announced in other cases which will furnish some guide to a proper determination of this question.

In the case of Bright and Fitch, in the Thirty-fifth Congress, the rehearing asked was refused because "all the facts and questions of law involved were as fully known and presented to the Senate on the former hearing as they were then presented in the memorial of the Legislature asking a rehearing." It was held that in such a case the judgment first rendered by the Senate "was final, and precluded further inquiry into the subject."

In the Butler and Corbin case, in the Forty-fifth Congress, the report of the minority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections correctly stated that no allegation was made "that testimony was before excluded which ought to have been admitted, or that testimony was admitted which ought to have been excluded; no request by either party to produce testimony had been denied, and no pretense that testimony then offered and excluded can now be produced. The jurisdiction is the same, the parties are the same, the subject-matter of contest is the same, the facts are the same, and the questions of law are the same." The report further said: "If, on the former hearing, Mr. Corbin had been denied the privilege of introducing material facts which he offered to produce, if he presented material facts now which were then unknown, if all the facts and questions of law now known and presented were not then as fully known and presented, the undersigned will not undertake to say his petition for a rehearing ought not in justice and right to be gravely heard and considered on the merits." The Senate adopted these views, though it is a significant fact that a large and intelligent minority of the Senate voted to unseat Mr. BUTLER and to admit Mr. Corbin when not a single new fact or question of law had been presented or offered.

Your committee freely admit that a decision rendered on the merits ought not to be afterward reviewed and reversed on light or even doubtful grounds. In the courts the familiar rule is that new evidence to authorize a reversal "ought to be material and such as would probably produce a different result." In this case your committee are willing to apply a much stronger test, though there is no reason why a stronger should be required. Let us adopt and apply the rule so strongly and forcibly expressed by a distinguished member of this Senate in the following language:

"The Senate would do manifest injustice were it hastily and without the most plain and most manifest reason to reverse a decision that had been made seating a Senator on this floor. The case must be extremely strong that would justify such a proceeding. All that I am free to admit; but to say that the technical rule of res adjudicata that applies to courts of justice applies in this Chamber on a question of this kind is to confound all distinctions and to disregard all the laws of this body."—Congressional Record, May 7, page 24.

Let us now apply this rigid rule to the present case.

1. On the former hearing not a single witness was examined. Some admissions were made by the parties and some reports of investigations by congressional committees not on the issues involved in this contest "were agreed to be considered in evidence as far as they were pertinent." This was done only to narrow the field of investigation.

On this hearing nearly one hundred and fifty witnesses have been examined, making over twelve hundred printed pages of testimony of the most material and controlling character.

2. On the former hearing the memorialist begged and pleaded for the privilege of having witnesses called and examined on five points not covered by the admissions and reports above referred to, and by which witnesses he alleged he could prove, among other things, the direct personal complicity of the sitting member in glaring frauds in the pretended Legislature which elected him. All these appeals were refused by the majority of the committee, although an investigation had been previously ordered by the Senate and resolved upon by the committee, and the investigation was suddenly closed, against the protest of the memorialist and a minority of the committee.

On the present hearing the witnesses have been examined and the complicity of the sitting member in the frauds alleged has been most convincingly established.

3. On the former hearing there was no evidence and no opportunity to produce evidence showing conspiracies, bribes, and other corruptions by the sitting member to procure a fraudulent Legislature and to control the members thereof in his own election to the Senate. On the present hearing such conspiracies, bribes, and corruptions of the most startling, unblushing, and unparalleled character have been positively testified to by numerous witnesses; and these bribes and corruptions have been shown to extend to the witnesses in the case in the very face of the Senate.

Your committee could multiply the features of contrast between the former and the present hearing in this case, but we forbear.

Under the most technical rule of res adjudicata there is not a court in civilized Christendom which would hesitate to review and reverse a judgment so utterly unauthorized and unjust; and surely it cannot be contended that the Senate can have less power than a court to annul such a decision. Conceding, then, for the argument, that the Senate in passing upon contests for seats in this body acts as a court and that the technical rule of res adjudicata applies to decisions rendered in such cases, do courts not re-examine, review, and reverse their decisions? Are not appeals, writs of error, motions for new trials, and bills of review familiar to us all? The Senate in considering such cases in the first instance is not bound by the forms of proceedings in the courts. We have no declarations, no complaints, no bills in chancery, nor pleas, demurrers, answers, and joinder of issue in the Senate. If the Senate proceeds to original judgment without the pleadings known to the courts, may not the Senate also proceed to review, re-examine, and reverse such judgments when good cause is shown, without resorting to the processes which in such cases are known to the courts? If the Senate is a court, then, if the facts in a given case are such as would require the vacation of a judgment if rendered by a court, surely the Senate would also be authorized to vacate such judgment. The exclusion by the court of material testimony on the first hearing, the discovery of new and material evidence since the hearing, the existence of frauds, forgeries, bribes, and perjuries in procuring the first judgment are all well-known grounds, on either one of which courts by some of the methods of proceeding, will review and reverse such judgments. All these grounds are shown by the evidence and the records of this Senate to exist in extraordinary clearness, force, and repeated abundance in the case we are now considering. Is the Senate by being likened to a court to be bound by decisions which a court would vigorously vacate and annul?

But the attempt to apply to the Senate the technical rule of res adjudicata as it obtains in the courts is a palpable sophistry and not an argument. In the correct and forcible language of Senator TRIMBULL before quoted, "it confounds all distinctions and disregards all the rules of this body."

In cases where the contestants claim to represent the same State government, and the issue between them is one of informality or irregularity or non-compliance with the statutory provisions, there would be some show of reason for the application of this doctrine. In such cases there ought to be an end of litigation in the Senate as well as in the courts. A wise policy would certainly require in such cases the principle if not the rule of res adjudicata. It is to such cases the authorities cited by the eminent counsel for the sitting member were intended to apply.

But the questions involved in the present case rise immeasurably above such issues. They are not questions of regularity, but of authority. They are not questions of discretion, but of duty. They exist more between the State of Louisiana and this Senate than between the contestants. In their nature these questions are not merely judicial, but political in the highest sense.

The Constitution says: "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof." Can a man sit as a member of this Senate who was not chosen by the Legislature of his State? But suppose, in ignorance of the fact that he was not so chosen, the Senate is induced to declare him entitled to the seat "on the merits" after investigation, does such erroneous decision supplant the Constitution and give him a title after the mistake becomes known?

Let us suppose an impossible case: Suppose a majority of this Senate should for any purpose, partisan or otherwise, seat a man in this body who they knew was not chosen by the Legislature of his State; would any future Senate be compelled to continue such person in the seat? Would not such continuance be as criminal as the original admission? Will any man pretend that a plain constitutional provision can be superseded by a mistaken decision of this Senate? If the sitting member was not chosen by the Legislature of Louisiana, every hour he sits on this floor, after that fact is known, is a violation of the Constitution. It is a question of obedience to the Constitution. Can any power estop this Senate? Can the Senate estop itself from obeying the Constitution? Can the Senate estop itself from inquiring toties quoties whether he was chosen by the Legislature? Can it be so estopped by its own erroneous decision on a former hearing?

In cases like the one now before us, your committee do not hesitate to adopt the language employed by those eminent constitutional lawyers, Mr. Collamer, of Vermont, and Mr. Trumbull, of Illinois, in the Fitch and Bright case, in 1859. They said:

"The power of the Senate to judge of the election and qualification of its own members is unlimited and abiding. It is not exhausted in any particular case by once adjudicating the same, as the power of re-examination and correction of error and mistake, incident to all judicial tribunals and proceedings, remains with the Senate in this respect, as well to do justice to itself as to the States represented or to the persons claiming or holding seats. Such an abiding power must exist to purge the body from intruders; otherwise any one might retain his seat who had once wrongly procured a decision of the Senate in his favor by fraud or falsehood, or even by papers forged or fabricated."

In the light of the evidence now before the Senate the sitting member was admitted by a wrongly procured decision of the Senate in his favor by means quite as criminal as those stated in the last paragraph quoted, since the means employed by him to secure his pretended election included conspiracies, bribes, and perjuries, often repeated, and the knowledge of which was vigorously suppressed on the former hearing. He was not chosen by the Legislature of Louisiana. He was chosen by a body of men who conspired with him to defeat the will of the State, and who excluded by force the members elected by the people in order that the conspirators might be enabled to accomplish their work.

The primary authority to determine what is the Legislature of a State is and must be the State herself. When the State determines that question for herself it is determined for all the world. In case there are two governments, or two bodies, each claiming to be the true government or the true Legislature of the State, and the State has not determined the controversy, the duty may devolve upon others, and in this case upon this Senate to adjudge that question pro hoc vice.

In January, 1877, a portion of the members elected by the people united with others not elected and seized the State-house, by co-operation with the sitting member, who was then acting as governor, even barricaded in the building, which was surrounded with troops, and refused to permit other elected members to be admitted into the building. The barricaded persons called themselves the Legislature, and the excluded members met in St. Patrick's Hall and called themselves the Legislature. This was the condition of things when the sitting member presented his credentials to this Senate and asked to be admitted to a seat on this floor. He was not admitted, but his credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Before the committee took any action whatever, the issue thus raised between these two rival bodies was settled by the State. It was decided that the body which assembled and organized in St. Patrick's Hall was the true Legislature of the State. This decision was accepted by all the people of Louisiana and by all the departments of her government, by the President and House of Representatives, and by the circuit and district courts of the United States, and finally by all the persons who composed the body which seized the State-house.

The latter, which had been known as the Packard legislature, disbanded, leaving not a resolution or act or other thing which has ever been recognized as authoritative or which has been claimed to be valid save only the pretended election of the sitting member to this Senate, and this single act has been recognized only by this Senate.

The former body, which had been known as the Nicholls legislature, performed all the functions of a Legislature from the beginning, passed laws which are obeyed by all the people and enforced by all the courts. All the persons who had been elected left this pretended Packard legislature and took their seats in the Nicholls legislature, and those who had not been elected admitted they were not elected without even a contest, and went home, or into the custom-house or some other Federal office.

The regular Legislature thus organized, composed of all the members elected by the people, chose the memorialist to the seat he is now claiming. The election was free, regular, legal, and without taint of corruption of any kind and his credentials are in due form. Of a Legislature which was composed when full, senate and house, of one hundred and fifty-six members the memorialist received over 140 votes. Since the former hearing in this case the supreme court of Louisiana has also decided that the officers of the Packard government had in January, 1877, no official status, and that no acts performed by them at that time, though purporting to be performed virtute officii, could have the force and effect of official acts. (State ex rel. Lissou vs. Peck, 30 Annual Reports, 280.) And in addition to all this the evidence now taken shows that the Packard legislature which pretended to elect the sitting member was in fact as well as in law not a Legislature, but was a body of men assembled by fraud, held together by force, and controlled by bribery, with the aid and in the interest of the sitting member. Thus the facts, the law, the integrity of this Senate, and the voice of a too long defrauded State of this Union unite in demanding the passage of the following resolutions, which your committee now submit for adoption by the Senate, to wit:

1. Resolved, That according to the evidence now known to the Senate WILLIAM PITT KELLOGG was not chosen by the Legislature of Louisiana to the seat in the Senate for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, 1877, and is not entitled to sit in the same.

2. Resolved, That Henry M. Spofford was chosen by the Legislature of Louisiana to the seat in the Senate for the term beginning on the 4th day of March, 1877, and that he be admitted to the same on taking the oath prescribed by law.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the report signed?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, sir; but it is the report of six members of the committee. I move that the resolutions presented, together with the majority and minority reports, and the testimony taken in the case, be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. All reports are printed under the rule.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I give notice now, as I think Senators can sufficiently understand this case in one week, that, unless some person shall desire it to be called up sooner, I shall call the matter up for action on Monday next after the morning hour, and will seek to continue action until its final disposition.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to my colleague that he withhold the notice until the reports and evidence shall be printed. There has been some delay in the printing recently, and it may be some days before the reports can be printed.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is a very wise suggestion, but I will say to my friend, the Senator from Tennessee, that it so happens in this case that both reports will be printed in the RECORD, and the Senate will see them to-morrow morning.

Mr. BAILEY. The evidence will not be printed.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The evidence is already printed, and I suppose it will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think only fifty copies have been printed for the use of the committee.

Mr. BAILEY. A limited number was printed for the use of the committee.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. If there should turn out to be any delay, I will certainly give the Senate ample time to study the case, because there is nothing I so much desire as that the Senate shall understand it.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose the motion which has been made is debatable.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report itself will be printed under the rules, without a motion.

Mr. HOAR. The motion is to print the report, with certain evidence accompanying it, for the use of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is debatable.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have no objection to debate.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish in discussing this question of the evidence, and in order to show to the Senate the importance of adopting the order for printing the evidence which has been referred to, to point out very briefly in connection with the report which has been read how little from that report, without an examination of the evidence, the Senate can understand of the true merits of this case; and I wish to do it by calling attention to two illustrations, in regard to which I should be glad to have the attention of the members of the Senate, if any of them have been impressed by the extraordinary document which the Senator from Georgia has read. I will take for convenience the first and the last of the points which the Senator from Georgia made as attacking and affecting the integrity of Mr. KELLOGG, the member now sitting in the Senate from the State of Louisiana. The Senator stated as a correct statement of evidence—

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BAILEY. I rise to a point of order. I believe it is not in order to discuss the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed under the rules; but the Senator from Georgia accompanies it with a motion to print also the evidence, which is a debatable question, on which the Senator from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Georgia stated that Mr. KELLOGG, then governor of the State of Louisiana, was a conspirator to an attempt to throw out the vote of a certain parish in the election for the Legislature, and he stated that the person whose duty it was to make the registry in that parish made a statement which he knew, and which Mr. KELLOGG must have known, under the circumstances, was false, that there was what he described as bulldozing going on, whereas the report asserts that it was a peaceable, quiet, and orderly proceeding, and nothing of the kind had taken place.

The judge, who fled from that parish while the registry was in progress, was a brave officer of the Army of the United States. Something happened to occasion his discontinuance of the process of taking the registry. What was it? That occurrence is related by the very witness upon whom the Senator from Georgia bases his entire report on that point; and what was it? When the registry had gone a little way a person presented himself for registration whom the judge declared, in the performance of his official duty, not capable to be registered; and thereupon a committee of the democrats of that parish waited upon that judge and informed him—this is the language of the testimony which I have here—that they required that he should register that man. On his demurring, the statement again was made that he must register him; and their manners were as quiet as the manners of anybody who Ever scuttled ship or cut a throat.

What parish was it in which, on that significant communication, the judge of the election abandoned his occupation? It was Grant Parish, in which within two years had taken place the notorious Colfax massacre, in which within two years had lain for days unburied in the sun the bodies of thirty-seven republicans, each shot to death in the back of the head. The fragrance of those unburied bodies had scarcely left the atmosphere. That was the comment that lent significance to the action of this committee of democrats who waited on the judge of election and informed him what they had determined he must do, what they had determined he was required to do. That little circumstance the committee do not see fit to advert to.

Mr. McDONALD rose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to inquire how this matter takes precedence of the special order?

Mr. HOAR. I am showing the importance of printing. It is a question of privilege relating to the seat of a Senator—a question of the very highest privilege.

That is the first of the points which this committee make. Now let me come to the last one, and I should like to have the attention of every lawyer, of every Senator belonging to the majority of this body, who expects to deal with this question as with all other questions under the sanction of his official oath and under the responsibility of his personal honor.

The report asserts that when the witnesses for Spofford came to Washington to be examined before this committee they were taken after midnight to Mr. KELLOGG's room at Willard's Hotel; that there arrangements were made with them by which they agreed to testify falsely when they appeared before the committee, and that sums of money were paid them. That is contradicted by every one of the men concerned. Upon whose testimony does it rest? It rests on the sole, unsupported, unconfirmed testimony of a man by the name of Barney Williams, a man who has been once imprisoned as a thief at Ship Island, once imprisoned at the Dry Tortugas, who had his head shaved and was drummed out of the confederate army for larceny when he was a soldier there, and had the same thing happen to him after he deserted into the Union Army. And it is upon that testimony that it is sought to reverse the deliberate, considerate judgment of the Senate of the United States in regard to the highest object of personal and public ambition on earth—a title to a seat on this floor.

Not only is that the character of the witness on whom the committee, page after page, in their report have undertaken to base this finding, but he was contradicted by evidence which showed that it was utterly impossible that his statement could be true. Gentlemen not connected with this case, of high character and standing, were guests in Mr. KELLOGG's room at the time it was asserted that he bribed six witnesses in succession, and paid them the cash. These men were present in the room. One of them had his bedroom adjoining, a member of the other House, who testified that it was utterly impossible that such a thing could have happened. The man testified at what door he took these men in after midnight, and at what door he took them out; and the clerk at the hotel said that that door is always closed at an early hour, and that he knows it could not have been open that night, and that thing could not have happened. The watchman patrolling that entry testified that he knew no such men went in and that no such men went out.

The witness testified that in addition to the bribery there was a carousal, a sending for champagne, and a drinking bout. The waiters who waited upon that room in the morning and in the night both testified that nothing of the kind could have happened. This act, the first act in American senatorial history, criminal as we have declared it in our minority report as the act would be if consummated, finds its fitting comment in the character of this head-shaven horse-thief, on whose testimony the principal charge is based.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. President, I am gratified with one result already accomplished. The Senator from Massachusetts, in making his minority report, failed to consider the facts, and based his case purely on a legal proposition. I am glad that at the first skirmish he has been routed from that, and finds it necessary to precipitate or attempt to precipitate a discussion of the facts. The Senator will find himself that in doing so he is jumping, as we familiarly say, out of the frying-pan into the fire. There is no discussion which we will so cheerfully meet as that. And the two instances which the Senator selects now are striking. In relation to the first conclusion at which the committee have arrived, that the sitting member conspired to prevent a fair election in the State of Louisiana by throwing out votes, he says the evidence shows that the people demanded that a certain voter should be registered—

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Not the people but the democratic committee.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Have it anybody you please.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. No, but we will have it just what the facts show it was. You say the people; we say that the evidence is that it was a democratic committee.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Very well; I will take it just as my friend says it is. But here is the fact: Stokes, unfortunately for the gentlemen, came before the sub-committee at New Orleans and explained that whole matter, and said there was not a particle of intimidation; that the issue over the registration of a boy twenty-one years old was settled long before this man fled from the parish. That is what Stokes swears unconditionally, and Stokes is not disputed. Stokes was the parish judge and he says it was settled long before and that there was no bulldozing and no attempt to bulldoze.

But the gentleman is not satisfied with that. He goes behind and says there was violence in that parish two years before. Well, that is characteristic of this case; that is characteristic of all the issues which have been made about the Louisiana election from the beginning; for all the bribes, for all the corruption, for all the frauds that we could prove in that election by the sitting member and his assistants the reply has always been "intimidation and violence;" and they have gone back not as the law requires to the day of election or to the beginning of the registration, but they have gone back one year, two years, and in some cases five years.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator permit me to say that he misstates my point? My point is that when that committee waited on that judge and informed him that he must discharge his official duties according to their fancy, the proceedings and murders of the two years before gave a terrible meaning and significance to that act.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have stated that—

Mr. HOAR. That is my point.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The gentleman's statement will still get him deeper into deep water. The testimony to which he refers was not taken by this committee. He must refer to some testimony taken by a congressional committee previously. Let it be so. My reply is that Stokes, the judge of the parish, came before the committee and proved that that testimony was not true. So the gentleman is left without his prop there.

Mr. HOAR. Stokes was not the judge.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Stokes was the judge of Grant Parish. I say he was the witness. He was a competent witness.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Georgia will pardon me.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will not give way for these interruptions. Now I am talking about the facts. There was a dispute over the registration of a boy twenty-one years old, upon which witnesses were produced in a previous examination to get up a charge of bulldozing and intimidation. Judge Stokes, who was the judge of Grant Parish, appointed by Governor KELLOGG himself, came before this committee and stated that there was no truth in it, that there was no bulldozing, that the boy was requested to be registered and was registered; and Stokes says so far from there being any danger or any bulldozing in that parish, that the people in the hill country, which was a largely democratic portion of the parish, not only treated Ward nicely and kindly but absolutely paid his bills. Did that bulldoze him?

But they have gone back to borrow from former massacres, as they say, intimidations which they say affected the election of 1876, and in some cases they have gone back as far as five years. That is not the law, and that is not the fact. Still the gentlemen can use that argument for other purposes. I have no doubt if the gentlemen were driven to that resort they could very easily prove that the disturbance in the country during Noah's flood produced a terrible revolution, and if it had not occurred the democrats would not have carried the election in Louisiana in 1876, and I have no doubt that under the evidence in this case they could have proved it by some witnesses! So there is nothing in that. But we will meet the gentlemen on that. The testimony is to be printed and will show for itself, and if the Senator from Massachusetts has read the testimony, his statement is remarkable; if he has not read it, I know he will be exceedingly astonished with his own statement when he does read it.

He says, further, that the second point, that is bribery of the witnesses in this city, is proven solely by the ex parte testimony of Barney Williams, and then he proceeds to give a description of Barney Williams. He says his head was shaved once, he was arrested in some island, he was convicted of various crimes. Well, Mr. President, I will say for Barney Williams—I am not under any obligation to him—that a great many of the crimes charged against him were proven before this committee to have been committed by another Barney Williams. Barney brought the certificates of the judge himself that as to certain crimes he was charged with they related to another Barney Williams and not to this Barney Williams. There were various other things in regard to him. But that point is immaterial.

Now, I want to deal fairly with the honorable Senators on the other side, and I will say to them frankly that if the bribery of these witnesses rested solely on the testimony of Barney Williams I would not believe it. Will that do them? If the bribery of witnesses in this city rested solely on the testimony of any witness, Barney Williams or any other, I would not believe it. If a single one of the facts proven in this case rested solely upon some of the witnesses who testified to them, I would not believe it. Some of the witnesses, however, are undisputed; some of the testimony is unimpeached; and it is very material, too.

I will say to the Senator, moreover, that he is not only incorrect, but remarkably incorrect, when he makes the mistake of saying that the evidence of this bribery rests solely upon the testimony of Barney Williams. It does not rest solely upon the testimony of Barney Williams, nor with me even chiefly upon the testimony of Barney Williams. The committee is fair enough to say to the sitting member, and to say to the Senate in the report, that the testimony of Barney Williams as well as that of many other witnesses is entitled to credit only to the extent that it is corroborated; that it is not entitled to credit because of character, but it states the fact that this testimony is remarkably corroborated, and I will give the Senator the benefit now, in advance, of another admission. I will say that I myself had serious doubts, in fact, I was inclined not to attach the slightest importance to the testimony of Barney Williams until testimony was introduced here in Washington by the sitting member to rebut it. The sitting member has, unwittingly, introduced testimony here of his own witnesses who I think are entitled to no more credit than Barney Williams, except that they testified for the sitting member, and therefore he is bound by them.

But, sir, when I come to discuss this case on the facts, I will put the testimony of that bribery more upon other witnesses than upon Barney Williams, and largely and chiefly upon the testimony introduced by the sitting member himself. I tell the Senator from Massachusetts now that I will show that the testimony of the sitting member's own witnesses so strongly corroborates that of Barney Williams that he himself will be surprised. The truth is, either Barney Williams swore the truth or several witnesses produced by the sitting member swore falsely. There is no way to conclude that the testimony of the sitting member's own witnesses is true, unless you admit that Barney Williams swore the truth.

I am not going into that discussion now; it is not necessary, and I do not care to prolong this debate. I think that the Senate will entertain this discussion better when the testimony is known to the Senate, and I do not think it is proper to discuss the question now. We have not the testimony before us. Gentlemen can get up here and say anything, and the gentlemen who are most to be suspected are those who are so anxious to precipitate a debate now before the testimony is known, for I assure them it is their best chance. They have no chance on earth to sustain this case except before the testimony is understood. We on our side are perfectly willing and prefer to wait until the Senate is familiar with the evidence. We do not think it ought to be discussed before. We do not think the country will give any credit to what I am saying or what the other side have been saying this morning. They will say that perhaps we are as bad as the witnesses if we undertake to convince people what the testimony is before we ourselves know what that testimony is, and before it is printed and laid before the Senate.

I think, therefore, that the gentlemen have been unfortunate in precipitating this debate so earnestly and so quickly. I cannot see any good to be accomplished by it. It cannot influence the Senate, it cannot influence the country, because the Senate is under a duty, and the country will have the discretion of waiting until the testimony is known; and in the light of the testimony we will judge this case. I have no desire to bring the Senate to an unjust judgment. I confess here now frankly that my convictions rely mainly on the testimony which was introduced by the sitting member on many of these points. It was marvelous to me how that testimony made that credible which before was to me incredible. I admit the story of Barney Williams of itself was startling, was improbable; I was not disposed to charge it home to the sitting member as true; but when he undertook to rebut it, and when he employed the means he did to rebut it and brought in witnesses who testified to certain facts, and above all I give the Senator fair notice now that those witnesses who were called to testify as to the rear entrance to Willard's Hotel and as to who was in the sitting member's room and the transactions that occurred there that night while they were there, do in a most remarkable manner prove the truth of many things that Barney Williams said, and without them I should not have believed Barney Williams.

Mr. President, I think this discussion is wholly improper. The gentleman has made a report; the committee have made a report; the gentleman has made a speech; I have made another; and as this motion is unnecessary anyway, I will withdraw it.

Mr. CARPENTER. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. Was there any testimony before the committee, or do the committee find the fact to be, that at the session of the Senate which passed upon KELLOGG's case and decided that he was entitled to the seat on the merits, that decision was affected by any fraud or perjury practiced by Mr. KELLOGG upon the Senate?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The committee charges this, I will say to the Senator; and it is better to wait until he sees the report—

Mr. CARPENTER. I should like to know now.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The committee charges that these facts were known to the sitting member to exist at the time he insisted that the Senate should pass on the question without making the investigation.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then the only charge of fraud against him is suppressing—

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That is it.

Mr. CARPENTER. There is no allegation, then, in the report and no proof before the committee showing that any act of fraud was practiced upon the Senate itself when that decision was made?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. No, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. I take it the Senator will concede that Mr. KELLOGG's title cannot be affected by any bribes he may have committed this session.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do; I shall meet the question.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the honorable Senator permit me to ask him a question? If he withdraws the motion to print the testimony and then postpones the discussion of this case until the testimony is printed, when does he expect us to proceed with the discussion?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I understood from the Chair that the testimony would be printed as a matter of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair said the report would be printed as a matter of course. The testimony is not printed as a matter of course; it requires a motion.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I want the testimony printed, and if that is the case I renew the motion. I simply say that I think discussion now is improper; and I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] whose great ability as a lawyer I so cheerfully recognize, that I concede the legal proposition he has laid down as to bribes committed since the admission to the Senate of the sitting member. I go further. In my judgment, bribes committed since his election do not of themselves authorize the vacation of his seat, but would be ground for expulsion. I grant that. But the testimony in this case became material, first, because there is shown by the bribes he has committed since a persistent effort, as we thought, to conceal the corruptions that existed before the election and by which the election was procured, and thereby they became important. Again, upon the familiar proposition that if he would be guilty of corruption in order to bribe the witnesses, it would be a very strong presumption that he would not hesitate to bribe members of the Legislature; and in that light it was very strong.

Mr. CARPENTER. I believe the rule of law is that for the purpose of raising a presumption to sustain the principal charge you may show, by decisions of some States, even in Massachusetts I believe, that the defendant had committed the same offense or a similar offense prior to the time charged; but I have never heard before that you can establish the former offense by proving a subsequent one.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I say to the Senator very frankly that I shall meet him fairly on the legal proposition that this testimony of bribes and corruptions since his election is only to be considered material by the Senate as it enlightens the judgment of the Senate upon the bribery committed before the election. That is as far as the Senator can ask me to go; I am giving the Senator now the proposition. We concede that the proof of bribes and corruptions since his election is only entitled to be considered by the Senate as it becomes evidence to their minds of the truth of the charges of bribery committed before the election and in procuring his election. I do not care to go into the whole question, but I state that fairly, and I know it is as fully stated as the Senator himself could ask.

Mr. CARPENTER. Allow me to put a question?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. If John Smith is indicted for larceny in 1877 and is on trial for that offense, can you introduce evidence tending to show that he committed larceny the next year for the purpose of showing that he did it before also?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I concede you could not.

Mr. CARPENTER. That rule only applies to Senators, and not to horse-thieves, then!

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The Senator will understand that the rule has no application in this case; and, with all due deference to my friend, it is a sophistry to attempt to make it appear so. The testimony was not taken upon that rule. The Senator is at sea because he does not understand the testimony.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to invoke his aid to get me ashore?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the object of that testimony was not to show that KELLOGG was so accustomed to bribery this year that he probably did it two years before, what was the object of taking that testimony?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I do not want to be pressed into this discussion; but there is no better evidence that a criminal in court committed the crime with which he stands charged than his efforts to suppress the testimony and the discovery of the testimony that he did it. The Senator knows that significance; and that is the rule upon which this testimony was admitted, not the one which the Senator so adroitly states. The Senator will be as candid as I am; the proof is not that he committed another offense—for we are not trying KELLOGG now for the bribery of witnesses here; that could only be upon a proposition to expel; we are trying him for bribes committed before, and by which he procured his election. But does the Senator deny that testimony of efforts to suppress that bribery, of efforts to cover up those corruptions committed before his election, is not admissible as evidence that he did commit them? He is too good a lawyer to deny that proposition. He knows that the subsequent conduct of a criminal after he is charged with an offense is admissible; for instance, after a man has committed murder the fact that he flies, the fact that he bribes a witness who saw the murder committed not to testify, the fact that he resorts to any method to suppress the discovery of his guilt, is admissible in all courts and regarded as the very highest evidence of guilt. The Senator knows it, and the Senator's ingenuity, invoked so hastily, to apply a rule to this testimony which does not belong to the testimony and to ignore the rule so familiar to that Senator which does belong to the testimony, is but another illustration of the stress to which gentlemen are driven; for when a Senator with his great skill and his great legal learning resorts to such an artifice in order to apply a rule which does not apply and prevent the application of a rule which does apply, the case must be in a bad way.

I say, then, that when the Senator comes to understand this testimony, when he comes to understand these points, he will not insist on the rule which he has just now suggested. Truth can wait until the testimony is printed. A just judgment in this case can afford to wait until the testimony is printed. If you want to get a judgment that is not just, I do not blame you for discussing it now; I do not blame you for pitching in headforemost, as we say, without consideration and without knowing the facts. Wait; wait till you hear the testimony; wait till you understand the case; wait till the legal rules that do apply to this testimony are discussed. Then if the Senate has not the courage to declare the judgment rendered by this committee, the very stones ought to cry out.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question more?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. I want to get ready to understand this case when it comes up.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It takes the Senator long to understand the case. I do not blame him, for I do not think he does. I think he can understand it readily when he has the testimony all before him.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator from Georgia has no right to assume that every Senator is as sharp as himself. He might bear with us, let us feel our way from the start, so as to get at what the committee was really about. We do not clearly see. Now, the question I want to ask him is this: Suppose the Senate should read all this testimony and come to the conclusion that Mr. KELLOGG had bribed himself through and had been elected by forgery, and perjury, and bribery, &c., &c., and should decide on passing a formal resolution that Mr. KELLOGG was not entitled to his seat and that Mr. Spofford was entitled to the seat in the Senate; would there be anything in the way of Mr. KELLOGG's coming back here at the next session of Congress with a memorial charging that Mr. Spofford had bribed all the witnesses who appeared at this session of Congress and that the testimony was all false, and establishing a new case on which the Senate would have to adjudicate again and might decide that after all KELLOGG was entitled to the seat?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. That question is answered in the report, as the Senator would have heard if he had attended to its reading. He only convinces me by the question that he did not attend to the reading.

Mr. CARPENTER. I did not hear it all; I was not in the Chamber all the time.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Now the Senator calls on me to enlighten him. He says that he is groping in darkness, which is very manifest, and he wants me kindly to take him—

Mr. CARPENTER. Hold out your hand and lead me ashore.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. My hand! There is no light in that. That will not guide even a misguided friend like the Senator from Wisconsin. If he wants light, it is within his reach; light which will take him out of all darkness; light which will show him the truth incontrovertible. That light is the evidence.

Mr. CARPENTER. Does that settle the question of law?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly there is no law without facts. Every lawyer knows that you must know the facts before you can raise questions of law or decide questions of law.

Mr. CARPENTER. Then the jurisdiction of the Senate to pass upon the question again depends on how strong a case it may be?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The decision by the committee is that where the parties had offered to give evidence and were not allowed to do it, and that evidence is shown to be material, that evidence is such as to change the result, if that evidence is such as leads the committee to believe that if the Senate had had that evidence before it it would not have rendered the judgment at all, that leads the committee to believe that the sitting member was not in truth elected by a Legislature, it is not only the power but the duty of the Senate to receive it; but of course the committee lay down the limitations within which that can be done.

Mr. CARPENTER. How many times can it be done?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. We say in the report—

Mr. CARPENTER. How often?

Mr. BLAINE. Once a year? [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I of course wish to be courteous to the Senator and to his friends; but the Senator's questions are all answered when he reads this report. As far back as 1859 that question was answered by the able report made to this Senate by Collamer, of Vermont, and Trumbull, of Illinois, which is quoted.

Mr. TELLER. Was that adopted?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. It was not; but I commend it to your attention.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Trumbull and Collamer made a minority report, which was not adopted by the Senate.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Certainly, and they give the reason why, because they said in that case there was no evidence, no fact, and no question of law—

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Let me get through. No question of law was brought to the attention of the Senate on the rehearing that was not before the Senate on the original hearing. That point was distinctly raised.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me. Mr. Bayard said in these words, "we are precluded from entering upon a consideration of the facts."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Mr. Bayard's words are quoted by this committee in the report they have rendered.

Mr. HOAR. Some of them.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I suppose they were not as mellifluous but quite as true when made by Mr. Bayard as they are when quoted by the Senator from Massachusetts—quite as much so. The words of Mr. Bayard are familiar to this committee. I repeat they are quoted in the report of this committee; they are relied upon by this committee. This committee stood upon them in the Butler-Corbin case; this committee stand upon them now; and whenever the Senate shall bring this case within the case of Bright and Fitch, we will take great pleasure in voting with the gentleman.

I thought it was an easy matter to enlighten my friend from Wisconsin; indeed I thought he was a self-illuminating individual, and I think he is. I think he does himself great discredit when he calls upon anybody for light, but as he does call for light I insist that the Senator shall wait for the evidence and wait for the case, and then we will discuss it; and though I admit the powers of the gentlemen on the other side, very great powers in handling law, they cannot alarm us because our strength is in our cause, not in ourselves.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a very extraordinary scene, to be debating this question before the report has been printed, before we have seen what is the evidence, and that to the exclusion of a great public measure that was taken up and is the unfinished business of to-day. I move to lay the motion on which the present debate is now pending upon the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio moves that the motion of the Senator from Georgia lie on the table.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 15, noes 30.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, nothing but the extraordinary circumstances that exist would justify me in asking the attention of the Senate even for a few moments, and I promise the Senate that I will not occupy much of their time.

In what I have to say regarding the motion to print this evidence I wish to refer to two or three points connected with the evidence that have been discussed. I feel justified in doing this not only by the fact that the Senator from Georgia has done the unprecedented thing of reading his own report before the Senate and predicating some, at least, of his allegations against me upon evidence that he alleges exists in the record and that I deny as existing in the record, but because the Senator from Georgia, before any evidence was taken in this case, declared publicly and privately that he intended to drive me from the Senate and made it distinctly apparent that he had already prejudged the case. He is my judge. It is the Senator from Georgia who was chairman of the sub-committee at New Orleans; it is the Senator from Georgia that, before the committee, when my case was being considered in November, 1877, told the committee that he would prove that I had manipulated the returns and had interfered in connection with protests before the returning board. It was the Senator from Georgia who came on the floor of the Senate and moved to recommit the report made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in my favor, asserting that he had evidence in his possession to establish the fact of my illegal interference with the sessions of the returning board. All this appears in the record. It was the Senator from Georgia that sent to the Secretary's desk and had read a telegram, dated at New Orleans and signed H. L. Smith, saying, (in substance,) "We have discovered evidence that inculpates KELLOGG in connection with the returns before the returning board"—a telegram which, as I have stated in public two or three times, and I challenge contradiction, was paid for to the amount of $300 and which was false in every line and word. That the Senator's statement in this regard was utterly without foundation is proven by the fact to which I now call the special attention of the Senate, that there cannot be found in the volume of evidence of twelve hundred pages taken before this committee one iota of testimony showing that I participated directly or indirectly in the making of any protest, in the manipulating of any returns, or that I had any connection, directly or indirectly, with the action of the returning board further than as stated on the original hearing of this case and the evidence in regard to which was all of record when the Senator made his assertion.

The Senator from Georgia asserted that he would prove that I went through a side door with affidavits and influenced or sought to influence the returning board to make returns in favor of members of the Legislature, and he asked the Senate to send that report back to the Committee on Privileges and Elections in 1877 for reconsideration, and he said, as reported in the RECORD, page 773:

I state these facts to show that while this charge has been long known, while it was made when the committee first met, while it has been before the committee all the time, and while it was in what lawyers call the pleadings, made up to lay the foundation for the evidence, the evidence itself in various forms is coming to us constantly.

I assert—and the Senator cannot deny it—that though they raked the slums of New Orleans, though they brought perjured witnesses almost without number before the committee, they were never able to produce one word, not one syllable, not one letter of evidence to substantiate these allegations. This assertion of the Senator's that I improperly influenced the returning board forms one of the "five points" upon which Mr. Spofford asked that the case might be reopened; and let me say here that, except upon one single point of those five points, and that in reference to the third ward of the parish of Orleans, there is not within that volume of twelve hundred pages of testimony one line or one syllable of evidence in substantiation of any one of these assertions, and not a particle of evidence was introduced in support of the particular allegation so pointedly and repeatedly made by the Senator from Georgia.

The Senator from Georgia has come before the Senate with his report containing carefully selected extracts from the testimony, and he has read them in a shrill voice in order that the Senate and the country might be precluded from a further knowledge of the testimony than what is contained in his report, until the effect of it, prejudicial to me, has operated here and elsewhere, knowing that the Senate, so to speak, is a pulpit with a huge sounding-board, and that every word here uttered goes to the uttermost ends of the land. I stand here to tell the Senator that more than one-half of the allegations he has thus made are not sustained by even the slightest fragment of testimony, and the Senate will so find when they come to examine the record. He scarcely opens his mouth but out a blunder flies.

Let us see. He said Stokes, the witness examined before that committee in New Orleans, was parish judge of Grant Parish. Stokes was appointed parish judge in 1875 and staid in the parish about two years. But as he himself admits he was not in the parish when Ward, the supervisor, left; he ceased to exercise the functions of parish judge some time before; and in reply to Senator CAMERON's cross-examination he further admitted that he was not there during the election and of his own knowledge knew nothing about it; yet this man is the only witness who testified before the committee here or in New Orleans touching my alleged participation in protests or election returns or action of supervisors in any parish of the State.

All Stokes swears to in this record on this point is about a finger's length of printed matter, and I am going by way of illustration to read it to the Senate, and it is a plain proposition I now make, that that is the only iota of evidence on this point in the whole twelve hundred pages taken by the committee. Let us see what this man Stokes swears to. He admits in his evidence here and in New Orleans that he has been out of employment for three years; a dissatisfied republican who was brought here by Mr. Spofford and Mr. Cavanac, paid while the committee were in New Orleans, and paid here, trotted backward and forward, and paid his mileage and per diem. I read now from his testimony, page 669:

Question. What was the trouble in that parish?

Answer. He [Ward, the supervisor] claimed that he had been bulldozed and driven out of the parish. He left surreptitiously, and nobody knew that he had gone. He had hidden his books, and there was no election except what they held of their own accord. He told the governor—

He had before said that he took Ward in to see me—

He told the governor what he had done, and he said that if the people there didn't want an election we will throw the parish out. The governor said that.

On cross-examination he said:

Q. State what took place when you and Ward went in there to see the governor.
A. I have stated it. He said that he had been bulldozed and driven out of the parish.

Q. What else was said?

A. Governor KELLOGG said if the people did not want an election he would throw out the parish.

Q. What else was said?

A. The governor told me to go with Mr. Ward and see Blanchard or Jewett.

Q. Which did you see?

A. When we first went in, Mr. Jewett; a few moments afterward Blanchard came in.

Q. State the conversation you had in there.

A. It was the same as I have told you now.

Q. You may repeat the conversation.

A. He told Governor KELLOGG that he had been bulldozed and driven out of the parish.

I assert that Stokes's is the only particle of evidence there is in the whole record taken by the committee in reference to all this stuff. Why did they not bring Ward if Stokes, as he says, took Ward in to me and Ward said he had been driven out of the parish, and I said "If they do not want any election there, we will throw out the parish?" Why did they not call Ward, so we could cross-examine him? The real facts are, and it is in the record, that I gave Ward a written order to go back to the parish, and he was in fact furnished with money to return and hold the election. Grant Parish was thrown out; there were no returns from it made by the returning board. It had been the scene of the Colfax massacre referred to so effectively by the Senator from Massachusetts, a massacre that we may have a little discussion about when the proper time comes. I am thankful for the opportunity thus afforded me to show the Senate and I will show the American people just what occurred in that parish in 1873 and on whose heads rests the responsibility of that hecatomb of corpses that were piled up in Colfax court-house in that horrible, atrocious massacre.

I have said that the Senator from Georgia went as chairman of the sub-committee to New Orleans. I have said that he heralded his going by declaring that he intended to drive me from the Senate. The sub-committee arrived there on the 17th day of November, and the first day they tried to get evidence in reference to my alleged manipulation of the returning board, but not one fragment of evidence could they obtain. Afterward they brought up a man named Miller, but he testified so squarely against what they wanted that they at first refused to pay him. About three o'clock in the afternoon of the second day, it was apparent from manifestations around me that a columbiad was to be fired. The door opened and they brought in a Polish Jew spy, saturated with the fumes of whisky and tobacco, offensive for a distance of several feet around him. All the clothes he had on would not have sold for fifty cents. They brought that besotted Jew and seated him at the end of the table, and they began to gather around and I knew the grand crisis had come. They were determined to have something at last. The Senator from Georgia sat himself in front of Barney Williams and told Barney to tell his story.

Mr. President, I will not go into that story except to say that in substance it amounted to this: that I had employed him—a man who admitted that he was a stranger to me until he presented himself to me here at this door—that I employed him to go to the depot and watch for the arrival of the witnesses from New Orleans; that he went there day after day for three or four days—he says every night—to see that the witnesses had come, though his own evidence showed he arrived only the night before them. At last they came, and on the night of their arrival he took the five witnesses from the Philadelphia Hotel, where they stopped, down F street to the back entrance of Willard's Hotel, took them up the back way into my room about twelve o'clock at night; that there was any quantity of champagne, cigars, and cognac already furnished. The witness every now and then would say to Senator HILL, "I wish I had some of that cognac now; it was good cognac, Mr. Senator. I cannot speak so good English as you, Mr. Senator; but I wish I had some of that cognac now." Then he would add, "I am afraid I will be hurt or lose my pension for what I say to-day." "Oh, never mind, Barney; go right along; just tell all about it," the Senator from Georgia would consolingly reply. "But I will lose my pension that I am trying for." "Oh, no you won't, Barney," the Senator said, "We will take care of that!"

And then this witness went on and swore that in the presence of nine men I gave $500 apiece in new $100 bills so stiff that they would not bend to these five witnesses, and we all at last broke up about daylight in the morning, and he and the witnesses went home with a grand hurrah and the exclamation that they would "Give it that old rebel in the neck!"

Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia sat with nostrils dilated and eyes flashing, and swallowed these chunks of perjury with manifest delight, and when I demanded an immediate investigation into the character of this man—for it was unknown to me—I was told, "After a while you shall have a chance,"—very kindly, too—"and as soon as you produce your witnesses we will go into it; but I think we had better adjourn now." This for effect. Scatter these seething lies broadcast all over the North, and everywhere; after a while we will listen to your refutation. On several occasions, when witnesses had made the most damaging and transparently untruthful statements in regard to me on direct examination, the watch of the Senator from Georgia would indicate that it was time to adjourn before a proper cross-examination could be had. When Barney's examination in chief closed the first day, by direction of the Senator from Georgia he was remanded to the custody of the assistant sergeant-at-arms for the protection of his precious life, and all the time the committee remained in New Orleans, except a day or two, he was lodged and fed at the public cost with an assistant sergeant-at-arms detailed as valet de chambre.

Everybody laughed, everybody derided the testimony, except the Senator from Georgia. An ex-democratic recorder came to me that night and said: "Governor, I do not think very much of your party, but when they bring such men as Barney Williams to malign you, this is too ridiculous altogether; and if you want, I will go before the committee and swear that that man has been impeached before my court repeatedly and cannot be believed on oath." So the next morning I summoned that judge, and information reached me constantly from democrats as well as republicans, from the former especially, of the infamous character of the man. Four recorders swore that his evidence had been repeatedly impeached before their courts. The man who guarded Williams when he was serving out a sentence of six months with ball and chain for larceny at Ship Island identified him. One of the officials of the Jewish church swore that he went on his bail when arrested for larceny until his patience tired out; and he testified, as did Judge Gastinel, that he saw Barney when he was tarred and feathered and drummed through the streets of New Orleans by the confederates with his head shaved and divided into quarters and one side of his beard shaved; that he was again ignominiously punished under Butler and sent to Ship Island on Dry Tortugas for horse-stealing.

The Senator from Georgia said there was a certificate produced by Barney from a judge that another Williams than Barney had been tried before him, but this certificate had no reference whatever to the charges and convictions we proved against Williams. That certificate was put in evidence gratuitously by Barney to show that there was a case where it had been said he was convicted of a felony and when, as he asserted, it was another man. He never even tried to rebut our evidence that he had been convicted of larceny, had had his head shaved, and had been repeatedly impeached before courts.

I shall endeavor to show when we come to discuss the entire case where that evidence has been revised, where in some portions material statements have been omitted. I shall refer to the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts and ask them if certain proceedings did not occur before the committee and if certain statements were not made which do not appear of record, and I will endeavor to show that the record is not accurate in some respects. I will also endeavor to show what this public prosecutor who boasts in a recent letter that came under my notice, published I think in the Savannah News, that when he acted as Senator he always acted not according to his preferences but according to his stern idea of equal justice, has done to malign me personally; what he has done to try and make a case unfairly against me and to forestall public opinion. The spectacle to-day witnessed has proved the latter if nothing else.

Barney Williams, forsooth! Mr. Merrick in his brief on behalf of Mr. Spofford had not the effrontery even to allude to him, and nothing but the malevolence of the Senator would cause him to rest as he did a large portion of his report upon that man's evidence. He was contradicted by every witness, by every person that he named from first to last, and by circumstantial facts stronger than any evidence. Why, I would almost be willing to accept what Barney Williams said as true if the Senator from Georgia will produce in the city of New Orleans, of two hundred thousand inhabitants, and from among all the ten thousand Jews of that city, one reputable citizen who will here or elsewhere say, even upon his honor as a gentleman, that, knowing Barney Williams, he would believe him under oath. And this is the man who is brought here to traduce me. I manipulated witnesses! What is to be said of those who brought Barney Williams into that room on the second day of the session of that sub-committee? What is to be said of those who put him in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms and paid his bills, when before he testified he had not money enough to buy a poor cigar or a five-cent drink of whisky? What is to be said of those who have since he testified set Barney Williams up in a small business in New Orleans? When the Senator from Georgia, confronted with the proof of this man's infamy, says that he does not rest this allegation of my bribing those witnesses upon the testimony of Barney Williams while his whole report says the contrary he is really pleading the baby act. That is what he is doing.

Mr. President, there is not an iota of evidence anywhere in this record, I assert it again, not a line, that he can torture from any witness and before any fair or impartial man into a corroboration of Barney Williams's testimony, while it is absolutely and overwhelmingly refuted by every man mentioned in connection with it. It is too scandalous; it is too preposterous. I did not believe that even the malignity of the Senator from Georgia would go so far as to bring up the testimony of Barney Williams and make it the basis of a large portion of his report.

I have sat day after day, Senators, and week after week, and I have seen the Senator from Georgia bring up affidavits, not always affidavits, but copies of affidavits, sworn statements, or what purported to be copies of sworn statements, and after proving by a witness that there was an original somewhere in existence, that this was substantially a copy of the original, he ruled that it be admitted and incorporated into the record as evidence against me. In one case, nay, in two cases, I fortunately could bring the man before the sub-committee, and he swore that that alleged statement of his was a forgery, and proved it, I think, even to the unwilling conviction of the Senator from Georgia himself, for he promptly dropped his cross-examination. Upon these alleged sworn statements, I assert, alleged copies of sworn statements signed by the initials of the man purporting to have made them alone, and upon the evidence of a notary, that he had sent the document that looked like a substantial copy of this, and he believed it to be, to another notary to be sworn to—upon that sort of evidence alone documents have been admitted in the record to establish bribery against me, and I, not my contestant, have been compelled to search for the man whose statements were thus to be used against me, and put him on the stand before the sub-committee as my witness. If I had not been able to find him that copy of an alleged existing original, not lost, or otherwise unattainable, would have been cited as original evidence against me. It still remains in the printed proceedings, printed twice, though traversed by the man alleged to have executed it.

That is the kind of fairness I have had, not in one case only nor in two but in many instances, as I will show in due time from the record. I assert as a fact established by the testimony that every affidavit admitted in evidence in New Orleans against me either forged or paid for, I have proved by one at least of the parties to the contract, the original written contract under which these affidavits were taken, that money was promised and paid by Mr. Spofford's agents to trump up these ex parte affidavits, and of the four thus obtained I showed that one was a bald, undisputed forgery, and two others were of men not known to me and not members of the Legislature, though they were represented as such to the notary who qualified them.

The Senator from Georgia may say those affidavits were ordered stricken out. They were ordered stricken out three or four days after they were admitted in evidence and after I had proved the forgery of one of the accompanying documents and had contradicted the other. Then the Senator may further say he did not know that those men were not members of the Legislature when he admitted their affidavits in evidence as declarations of co-conspirators against me. Unfortunately, the notary who produced those documents explicitly stated to the Senator that they were not the affidavits of members of the Legislature, yet as such the chairman ordered them to be admitted in evidence, and they remain printed in the record to-day, though constructively stricken out.

I will undertake to say that not since the foundation of this Government, nor in the annals of any legislative body, have justice and fair-play been so outraged as in the efforts of the Senator from Georgia to besmirch me and obtain a pretext for seizing possession of the seat I hold in this Senate.

In saying as I have done early in these remarks that nowhere in this volume of twelve hundred pages can it be shown that I in any manner, directly or indirectly, interfered with the protests or acts of supervisors of elections, I do not forget that a man named Kelly, of Richland Parish, examined before the Potter committee, testified that I had something to do with his protest. I am aware, too, that the Senator from Georgia will probably refer to a portion of this evidence that was offered in evidence before this committee. I will simply say in passing that the evidence of this man Kelly was taken before the Potter committee when he had previously sworn before the Morrison committee that I had nothing to do with his protest; and the protest he made, which is printed in evidence, is entirely different from anything which any one even insinuates I suggested to him. I had no opportunity to cross-examine this witness. Why did not the contestant call him before the sub-committee and give me that chance, instead of dragging in his statement, which he himself has contradicted, by a side window?

As a matter of fact, the parish Kelly served in was returned democratic by the returning board, and a democratic member was seated from that parish, and took no part in my election. Now I defy the Senator from Georgia to find a line of evidence, even in the evidence taken by other committees, except this.

I was about to say I would agree to risk my seat (but I see the Senator from Georgia who sat here but just now has left his chair) if the Senator from Georgia will put his finger on one iota of evidence in the twelve hundred pages of the volume before us, or of any of the many volumes of evidence of both Houses of Congress bearing on Louisiana affairs, in any manner connecting me with interference with protests or acts of the supervisors or the decisions of the returning board, save as I have referred to.

Somebody has been mistaking this evidence most wofully. I want to state it once more, (for I see the Senator from Georgia sitting now nearer me than he was some time before,) that there is not one particle of evidence in all the twelve hundred pages of this volume, or in any other evidence taken before either House of Congress, in substantiation of the one especial point of the five points on which Mr. Spofford asked that this case be reopened, except the evidence of this man Kelly, of Richland, to whom I have alluded, and in regard to the protest from that parish, and no new evidence at all in reference to the other four points, except some hearsay testimony in reference to the seventh ward of the city of New Orleans, which evidence had nothing to do with me; but its introduction enabled me to make my case stronger by bringing up the sworn certificate of the democratic committee (a self-constituted returning board) that the three republican candidates from that ward were duly elected.

There are several points made by the Senator from Georgia in his report which I would like to refer to now, but will forbear. One, however, occurs to me. He refers to a matter where he alleges that one Peter Williams swore that his name was affixed to a telegram without his consent. Why, if my memory serves me, Williams admitted that he authorized the signing of his name to telegrams concerning the election, and it is in evidence that the register of votes, the superior officer of Williams, was cognizant of the intention and object of the telegram referred to. This telegram had reference to a matter concerning the registration, and before the election; a matter that concerned and involved the official duties of Governor Hahn, the register of votes, and was a matter that I could not possibly have had any connection with, and there is not the slightest evidence in the record that I had even knowledge of it, nor indeed had I.

Upon the question of bribery I have nothing more now to say, except that every member of the Legislature, twenty-six or twenty-seven in number, who testified before the committee, and every person in a condition to know, came before the committee and swore positively and unqualifiedly that he never received any consideration whatever or knew of any member of the Legislature or any other person having received any consideration whatever to vote for me or to secure my election as United States Senator.

I may inquire right here, why if all this mass of evidence referred to by the Senator from Georgia was in existence and so easily obtainable, why was it not produced when my credentials were lying on your table, Mr. President, during the year of 1877? Why, when a joint resolution was passed by the Nicholls legislature a few days after the Packard government disappeared authorizing the appointment of a committee (upon which my present colleague served) to investigate every branch of my government specifically in regard to all matters connected with the administration of the executive department during the past four years, why were not these facts brought out? The statute punishing bribery could have been invoked for a full year after I was elected—for nine months after my opponent got full possession of the State machinery, and while my credentials were pending here in the Senate.

With gentlemen so much interested in finding something against me during the summer of 1877, prodding around and raking every department of my government, searching even my letter-books and private documents left in the executive office, why was not this alleged grave crime earlier brought to light? There was their expert, telegraphing up here, sending the telegram that I referred to some time since, which the Senator from Georgia had read from the desk when my case was pending, and upon which he sought to have a snap judgment rendered against me and to have my case returned to the committee upon the ground that they had discovered new evidence inculcating me in connection with the returning board.

Upon that committee, as I have said, was my colleague. Why is it that they have not been able in the full fruition of their investigation to produce before the sub-committee or this committee sitting here one iota of evidence in regard to any of these allegations except the overwhelmingly refuted testimony in reference to the matter of bribery? Why is it that during all that time when the Packard government had been overthrown by revolution, when the wreck was drifting in every direction, when many of the members of the Legislature were turned helpless into the street, when they were dissatisfied with what they regarded as their abandonment by their party, when they were derided, persecuted, and some of them threatened with indictment for past official acts, some of them even being put in jail on one pretense or another—why during all that year, when my credentials were pending, were not my opponents able, with all their five investigating committees, with all the inducements they had to besmirch me, why were they not able to find evidence enough to go before a grand jury set up and arrayed, I will not say packed, with a view to do that, and prefer some charge against me which would serve to hang an indictment upon? Some of the local democratic papers were all the time urging: "See that KELLOGG is indicted; it will aid us in preventing his being admitted to the Senate." During all these months, why were they not able to find sufficient evidence to make at least a prima facie case against me? Simply because there was no case to be made?

No, sir, the first evidence they ever secured was under the fifteen-hundred-dollar contract, the original of which I was enabled to produce in evidence, by which Mr. Spofford's agents agreed to pay $1,500 for the "necessary evidence" to support his case. The evidence discloses that a legislative committee meeting the two democratic members in a notary's office in New Orleans, without notifying the republican member, succeeded in getting two or three poor colored men before them with a view to obtaining from them sworn ex parte statements that they had been bribed to vote for me. Every one of these men subsequently came before the committee and swore positively that they were not bribed and knew of none who had been bribed to vote for me.

One word more and I have done. Mr. President, I bethink me that a good deal is said about the employment of members of the Legislature in the custom-house. Nothing has been said about the money paid to witnesses for the purpose of procuring evidence against me. Nothing has been said about the contestant's own witnesses, one of whom at least swore positively that he received money to vote for Mr. Spofford and knew of others who had. There is no word of that, but there is a resolution reported that he be admitted, though that resolution was negated by a solemn vote of the Senate nearly three years ago.

But it is said that the custom-house has been packed with the members of the Legislature who voted for me. I will not undertake to be accurate, but I will state that a majority of the members of the Legislature who were sworn before the committee and who were the most seriously inculcated (if it can be said that they were inculcated at all, even indirectly) were not in the custom-house. They were men who came from the parishes; one of them is in the Legislature now, and is not and never has been in the Federal service. One or two of them were members of the recent constitutional convention, reputable men and men of property. I will not pretend to be certain without examining the record, but I state broadly that there have not been at any one time more than eighteen or twenty of all the members of the Legislature among the hundred and fifty or hundred and sixty employees of the custom-house of New Orleans. From the emphasis that has been put on this point by the Senator from Georgia, one would suppose that there was a quorum there.

I do not care to go into that further now than this simple statement. Go to the evidence taken before the Teller committee, a committee of the Senate, and take the evidence in this case that we are discussing, and you will see that in every instance, with scarcely an exception, these men were put in the custom-house because they had no place wherein to lay their heads. They were ostracized and driven from their homes, and they were compelled to seek refuge in that great metropolis, and the kindly hand of the Federal Government in some instances was extended to them to save them from suffering and from starvation. In every case for their political opinions they were driven from their parishes by their political adversaries.

Mr. President, I said in the outset that my only excuse for thus troubling the Senate was that the action of the Senator from Georgia is evidently a personal attack upon me. If, sir, I have so bad a record, is it not passing strange that there has not been some evidence of it before, and that when I left the executive department of Louisiana with all the evidence, record and otherwise, that I left behind me, and when there was a manifest ability and undoubted inclination to prosecute me, that there was not some prosecution set on foot? Sir, I am willing to compare my character, morally or otherwise, with that of the Senator from Georgia. And if it comes to be a matter of moral or personal courage, the bitterest enemy I have in his own State of Georgia, I am quite sure, would not fail to concede that I stand immeasurably his superior.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, if we can have a vote, I shall not say a word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia that the testimony in this case be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 828) extending the privileges of sections 2990 to 2997, inclusive, of the Revised Statutes of the United States to the port of Saint Louis, in the State of Missouri, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. COKE. It is very important that this bill should be acted upon at the earliest possible day, and I give notice that I shall call it up after the morning business is transacted on Thursday. Early action upon the bill is necessary to avert an Indian war in that region, and it is the desire of the Interior Department that the bill be acted upon.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Printing with an amendment, to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That 12,000 copies of the proceedings connected with the funeral of and eulogies delivered in the Senate and in the House of Representatives upon the late George S. Houston be printed, 8,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 4,000 for the use of the Senate; and that the sum of $500 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay for the expense of procuring a portrait of the late Mr. Houston, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Printing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution to print the eulogies delivered in the Senate and House of Representatives upon the late George S. Houston, a Senator from the State of Alabama."

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1511) to amend the act approved September 27, 1850, creating the office of surveyor-general of Oregon, providing for the survey and making donations to settlers of the public lands in Oregon, and also the act amendatory thereof, approved February 14, A. D. 1853; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1512) for the relief of Eli Wright and John B. Meigs, volunteers in the military service of the United States in the Indian wars in Florida; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McPHERSON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1513) for the relief of Commodore Donald McNeill Fairfax, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. KIRKWOOD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. KIRKWOOD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 2524) in relation to the importation of classical antiquities and ancient coins and medals; which was ordered to lie upon the table and be printed.

GENEVA AWARD FUND.

Mr. THURMAN. I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business, being the bill (S. No. 1194) for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask unanimous consent, as it is entirely too late for the Senator from Arkansas to proceed to-day, that the bill be laid aside informally in order that the Committee on Appropriations may take up a little appropriation bill they have and which will pass this afternoon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

PRINTING DEFICIENCY.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, it is well known that the Printing Office has about exhausted the amount allotted it for printing and that there is nearly a stand-still there. The House has passed a bill appropriating $100,000 for part of the deficiency in the Printing Office. The Committee on Appropriations have considered it and report it back to the Senate and ask unanimous consent that it be now passed. There is nothing in the bill but an appropriation of $100,000 for printing, and I judge there will be no objection to it from any source. I send the bill to the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CORKRELL in the chair.) The Committee on Appropriations report back favorably the bill (H. R. No. 5258) to appropriate money providing for the public printing, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to have the latter clause of that bill read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the entire sum appropriated to supply the deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing and binding, and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing of debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and for the Departments, and for lithographing, mapping, and engraving for the present fiscal year, shall not exceed the sum of $400,000.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is that intended to inhibit Congress from making a larger appropriation? I do not know what other object it can have, and I do not see how that can have any force.

Mr. BLAINE. It is not expected to have.

Mr. ANTHONY. For Congress to order printing and withhold appropriations of the money needed to cover it, seems to me a kind of economy that is not very commendable. We provide that the deficiency shall not exceed $400,000; then we go on and order five hundred thousand dollars' worth of printing. Do we expect the Public Printer to pay for it out of his own pocket? I do not see the use of that provision.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator makes no motion?

Mr. ANTHONY. No, sir; I leave it in charge of the committee. I call attention to the fact.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator from Rhode Island has been for many years a member of the Committee on Printing and for a large portion of that time its chairman. He knows better probably than any other member of the Senate what the Printing Office will require, and he knows also that he has it in his power in connection with the committee of which he is a member to have the printing come within the $400,000 if he thinks proper to do so. I do not know whether it is proper it should be so or not; but I do know it can be done if the Senator and the Committee on Printing believe it ought to be done. I am not now expressing an opinion whether or not $400,000 is sufficient; but I do know this fact: If the Senator thinks that is the full amount that ought to be appropriated, the printing can be kept within it.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing have tried to restrain the printing within the bounds of appropriations, but have been voted down by the Senate under the lead of the Senator from West Virginia. We have reported propositions restricting the printing of Agricultural Reports, and the Senator from West Virginia, who stands at the door of the Treasury like the angel with the flaming sword at the Garden of Eden, drops his weapon to a military salute the moment the Agricultural Report comes up. The Agricultural Report that I understand is coming will take more than half that appropriation itself.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I acknowledge, as the Senator well knows, that I have a weak spot when agriculture is touched. He has put it very well indeed; but I want to remind him that fully half the people of this country are engaged in agriculture, and they have a right to be heard. In my opinion the appropriation for that Department is far less than it ought to be. I think the printing of its reports ought to be carried to the fullest extent. I have no scruples upon that matter; and I think the Senator from Rhode Island, for whom I have the highest respect, and I never shall disagree on the printing of Agricultural Reports and on encouraging, in any proper manner that Congress can do, the fostering of agriculture. I believe that great interest has been too long neglected, and my opinion is now that Congress should give it more attention, and I hope it will; and the Senator from Rhode Island, I trust, will aid us in our efforts in that regard.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, the clause which has been read is inserted merely as a premonition that inasmuch as the Committee on Appropriations of the House had inserted a deficiency of $400,000 in the bill which is now lying upon the President's table, it was to be distinctly understood that this $100,000 was only to be an advance of that $400,000.

Mr. BLAINE. On account.

Mr. WHYTE. On account, precisely. It was an anticipated payment of part of the $400,000 which is contained in the general deficiency bill, and I think it very well to leave it there because the Public Printer asked for $490,000 as a deficiency, and the House of Representatives only gave him $400,000. He had it "Fifty-four, forty, or fight," and they compromised on "forty-nine," which was done about Oregon some years ago. So that it is a very proper clause to insert in this bill as a matter of notice.

Mr. ANTHONY. My object is accomplished. I wished to call the attention of the Senate to the absurdity of limiting the appropriation, and then ordering work to be done that exceeds it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry. I understand that a House bill is here appropriating $400,000 for the public printing for the residue of the fiscal year. That bill of course is to go to the Committee on Appropriations. Now, if we pass this bill do we put it out of the power of the Committee on Appropriations, if they should think that $400,000 ought to be increased to $450,000; to recommend that increase to the Senate?

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Oh, no! of course not.

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly not.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It will be in the power of Congress to appropriate what sum they think proper.

Mr. BLAINE. This is really embodying in the bill a little monition which might have been left to my honorable friend, the chairman, to state to the Senate. It is lumbering up the statute-books with what ought only to have appeared in the RECORD. That is all there is to it.

Mr. ALLISON. But I think there is a great deal of force in what the Senator from Connecticut says. Here is a bill appropriating $100,000 for public printing and at the tail of it they say that all public printing, mapping, lithographing, &c., for this fiscal year shall not exceed $400,000.

Mr. THURMAN. Read it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will read the proviso.

Provided, That the entire sum appropriated to supply the deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing and binding and for paper for the public printing, including the cost of printing of debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and for the Departments, and for lithographing, mapping, and engraving for the present fiscal year, shall not exceed the sum of $400,000.

There is a statutory provision—

Mr. BECK. You have got it wrong.

Mr. ALLISON. I have read it.

Mr. BECK. Allow me to make a suggestion. On last Friday the House passed an appropriation of $400,000 for public printing in full of the deficiency.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. BECK. And after that bill was passed, believing it would take some time because of the number of other things in it, they passed this bill in a few moments, and desiring not to leave room for saying that they were passing $500,000, they put in this proviso in order to have it understood that the $100,000 was part of the $400,000.

Mr. BLAINE. My honorable friend from Iowa does not exactly state the meaning as he reads the proviso. He says that the amount of printing thus described shall not exceed that. It does not say so at all; it says that the amount appropriated shall not exceed that.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BLAINE. This merely binds Congress to only appropriate $400,000 though they may order a million dollars' worth of work.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, if we do this on the 22d day of March, and on the 25th thereof put in another bill of subsequent date, what purpose in the world is subserved by the proviso? It is of no value as it stands. It is of no value. I would strike it out; but as there is great haste to get the $100,000 in order to prevent the Public Printer violating the law every day, as he has been doing now for the last fortnight, let us take the bill rather than get into a cavil with the House about a proviso which at best has no meaning at all.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I shall move to strike out the proviso. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. BLAINE. That is only for delay.

Mr. ALLISON. I intend to make that motion in order that I may be further understood. The Senator from Connecticut makes the criticism that this is an implied inhibition upon the Senate when the second bill comes up here to increase the appropriation if in our discretion and judgment we see proper to increase it.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Does my colleague on the committee understand that the deficiency bill was passed previous to this bill by the House?

Mr. ALLISON. It has passed the House, but it has not yet passed the Senate. I do not care whether this provision is struck out or remains in, except that if it remains there can be no public printing without a substantial repeal of it by increasing the appropriation hereafter.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course not.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to call attention to one matter? I do not understand this proviso as attempting to prevent Congress from making whatever appropriation may be necessary for the printing we may hereafter order. It only provides that the amount appropriated for the deficiencies and for certain other purposes, shall not exceed $400,000. It does not by any means prevent our appropriating just as much as we may please for work we may hereafter order.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know that it does. I understand the proviso to be a limitation upon the total amount that shall be expended for printing during this fiscal year. If it is not intended as a limitation, it has no meaning whatever. The law says that no public printing shall be done, except as money is appropriated for that purpose. Therefore this is intended, if it is intended for anything, to confine our printing to the amount limited here, to wit, $400,000.

Mr. BECK. The whole thing is in a nutshell. The House in a bill they passed last Friday, in which there were many other items, some of them pretty complicated, as to United States marshals and deputies, &c., appropriated $400,000 for public printing. They believed there were items of that bill which would cause some discussion in the Senate, and it might be delayed, and the Public Printer could not afford to wait, and therefore they passed this bill giving $100,000, and only desired to say that this is part of the $400,000 they voted in the deficiency bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, allow me to ask the Senator if, when that bill comes over here—

Mr. BECK. It is here and before the committee now.

Mr. ALLISON. I mean when it is considered here. I ask the Senator frankly, if he thinks we can fairly, if we pass this bill now, add $50,000 to that bill if we believe in our judgment $50,000 more is wanted for printing?

Mr. BECK. We can add a million. We can say to-day we will give no more and we can give double to-morrow. The bill that passes to-morrow repeals pro tanto the one that passes to-day. The House has merely expressed a judgment for the time being, and only desired to say that this $100,000 is not in addition to the $400,000, but is to be a part of it. The Senate can reverse its action and so can the House, as we all know, at any minute, and so can our committee. All we desire now is to pass this appropriation of $100,000 so as to allow the printing to go on, and we can settle the other questions afterward.

Mr. EATON. I should like to say only a word to my friend from Iowa. I hold in my hand the bill in which $400,000 is appropriated, and I desire to say to him and to the Senate that after consulting the Public Printer I am informed that he had his conference with the House committee, and he agreed that for the sum of $400,000 he had no doubt the printing deficiency in the printing bureau would be all filled up. Now, with that fact known to the House committee, it is not to my mind at all surprising that they put the proviso upon this appropriation of $100,000, and I think we had better pass the bill as it is, because the House committee and the Public Printer agreed upon the sum of $400,000 as being sufficient.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Public Printer has no idea of the capacity of this body and the other House of Congress for talk. The gift of continuance is very widely diffused among us, and he does not know what amount of printing we may order nor to what limits the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD may swell. This bill seems to me to be in the way of the amendment of a bill that is not before us.

Mr. EATON. I beg to say to my friend that there was taken into consideration the voluminous record on Fitz-John Porter. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. However, I make no objection. I do not care about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa make a motion to strike out?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir; I do not insist on the motion.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and sixteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and fifty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Mr. ELLIS introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 250) requesting the President to notify the government of Great Britain of the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; which was read a first time by its title.

Mr. ELLIS. I ask that the joint resolution be read in full.

The joint resolution was read the second time in full.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. CONGER. I think the resolution should go to the Committee on the Inter-oceanic Canal. It has reference to the matters committed to that committee.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not understand the Select Committee on the Inter-oceanic Canal has usurped all the functions of the Foreign Affairs Committee. This is a joint resolution requesting the President to notify a foreign power of the abrogation of a treaty. The building of the inter-oceanic canal is a question subsidiary and secondary to that matter and merely incident to it. This is a matter for the consideration of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. It is a question for the House to determine. The gentleman from Louisiana moves that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The gentleman from Michigan moves, in amendment, that it be referred to the Committee on the Inter-oceanic Ship-Canal.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the joint resolution be again read.

The joint resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, to refer this joint resolution to the Committee on the Inter-oceanic Ship-Canal.

Mr. GARFIELD. Who makes that proposition?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. That committee is now considering the whole subject, and this joint resolution should be referred to it.

Mr. KING. I think the resolution should properly go to the Committee on the Inter-oceanic Canal.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, but the Chair has allowed one gentleman on each side to be heard. It is a question for the House to determine.

The question being put on Mr. CONGER's amendment, there were—ayes 72, noes 74.

Mr. CONGER and Mr. KING called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER and Mr. ELLIS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes 71. So the amendment was agreed to; and the joint resolution was referred to the Select Committee on the Inter-oceanic Ship-Canal, and ordered to be printed.

IMPROVEMENT ON ECLIPSE COTTON-GIN.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5375) to provide for the extension of letters-patent for an improvement upon the Eclipse cotton-gin; which was read a first time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION AS TO INTER-OCEANIC CANAL.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee, also introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 251) requesting the President to call an international convention of representatives from this Government and the republics of South America to take into consideration the policy or expediency of an inter-oceanic ship-canal; which was read a first time by its title.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire that the resolution may be read in full, in order that the question of its proper reference may be intelligently determined, either by the Speaker or the House.

The joint resolution was read in full the second time, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, &c., That it is the sense of this Congress that the political complications and conflict of national interest and jurisdiction likely to grow out of the construction of a water-way across the Isthmus which connects the American continents are of so dangerous a character as to greatly outweigh any advantages which are likely to result from such connection, either to the republics of North and South America or the nations of Europe, and that no interest of the people of the United States requires any such work; and therefore it is the duty of this Government to discourage an undertaking so much calculated to disturb our peaceful relations with other governments and fraught with so much peril to our future safety and well-being.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, through our diplomatic agents, to confer with the governments of our sister republics of South America upon the American policy in respect to measures likely to bring us and them in conflict with European powers, and that he be authorized to call an international convention of representatives from this Government and the republics of South America to take into consideration the policy and measures which should be adopted for mutual safety and protection against any political influence which the governments of Europe may in any manner attempt to exercise in the affairs of American governments.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. In view of the character of the resolution on this subject already reported to the House by the Committee on Inter-oceanic Canals, I think it proper for this one to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The resolution in respect to a proposed inter-oceanic canal heretofore reported by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] states a conclusion antagonistic to the spirit of the resolution which I offer, and it is hardly probable that the committee from which that resolution was reported will adopt one of a different character. I therefore think it better that we should have the views of another committee upon the important question involved.

The SPEAKER. It is a question for the House to determine.

Mr. CONGER. I will move that the joint resolution be referred to the select Committee on the Inter-oceanic Ship-Canal.

Mr. KING. I ask that the joint resolution be again read.

The joint resolution was again read.

Mr. KING. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Inter-oceanic Ship-Canal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has already made that motion.

Mr. KING. It relates to precisely the same question as the joint resolution voted on a moment ago.

Mr. ROBESON rose.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The Chair, however, will hear the gentleman if there be no objection.

Mr. ROBESON. It is a question of order I wish to present. I desire to know if this resolution is referred to the Committee on the Inter-oceanic Canal, whether it is done under Rule XI or not?

The SPEAKER. It will be done by the vote of the House.

Mr. ROBESON. Or whether this is a motion to suspend Rule XI? I find in that rule this proposition: that all subjects relating to the relations of the United States with foreign nations shall be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Does that rule govern this House or does it not? And if it is a rule, can it be suspended without a two-thirds vote? Here is a proposition which goes to the whole relations of our Government, not only with South America but with all European governments; a proposition which looks to our governmental influence all over the world. It includes not only our relations in regard to this canal across the Isthmus, but it relates to the attitude we are to stand in along with all the other nations on the American continent toward the monarchical governments of Europe.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say to the gentleman from New Jersey that limited debate only is admissible.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to present the question of order which I have stated.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I ask for the reading of the order of the House appointing this Select Committee on the Inter-oceanic Ship-Canal.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House has been sent for.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from New Jersey to the distinction between this case and the case he refers to under the rule. As I understand, this proposition involves not only a question relating to our foreign affairs, but also in addition a question relating to a subject which has been referred to a select committee. That branch of our foreign affairs which relates to this canal has been referred to a special committee. It is a question therefore for the House to decide to which committee this joint resolution shall be referred. The rule which the gentleman from New Jersey refers to relates to a question which is not susceptible of division; to a case where there can be no doubt, as in the case of a tariff proposition, where it should go under the rule.

In regard to a question of this character, which combines two elements, not only the one relating to foreign affairs but one which is a subject within the jurisdiction of a select committee, in my judgment it is a question for the House to determine.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already sent for the resolution of the House creating the special committee. It will be here in a moment, and will then be read for the information of the House.

Mr. KENNA. While the Chair is waiting for that order I would like to submit one observation in connection with the point of order raised by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON.] As I understand it the rules of the House which prescribe the manner in which subjects shall be referred to committees has always been construed to prescribe the manner in which the Speaker, acting in a mere ministerial capacity, shall make such reference without the formal action of the House. I do not understand that any rule has been adopted which would prevent the majority of the House making such reference as the majority might desire.

Mr. ROBESON. On the point of order—

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I believe I have the floor; I am waiting merely to hear the order read which authorizes the creation of this special committee.

Mr. REAGAN. While we are waiting for that order, I would like to ask to have read again the joint resolution introduced.

The joint resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will now be read authorizing the appointment of the select committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KING, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives. That a select committee of eleven members be hereby appointed, whose duty it shall be to examine into the subject of the selection of a suitable route for the construction of an interoceanic ship-canal across the American Isthmus; that all petitions, memorials, resolutions, bills, and reports on such canal or other mode of facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, be referred to this committee, and that they have authority to report to this House, at any time, such resolution as may be best adapted to secure such communication between said oceans."

Mr. ROBESON. There are two things which I wish to avoid this morning. The first is the reference to a wrong committee, in violation of the rule and of most evident propriety, of a proposition which properly belongs to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The second is, the bringing up for decision this question of order, which I understand is now under discussion in the Committee on Rules, before it comes properly before the House for consideration and discussion. And as it will be observed, from the reading of the joint resolution now introduced, that it embraces two resolutions, the first of which refers directly to the subject of an interoceanic canal, if I comprehend it correctly from the reading; and a second which calls upon the President to have a conference of the American States and governments to determine our general policy toward the governments of Europe.

The one resolution may, by a strained construction of the order authorizing the appointment of the select committee, be sent to the Committee on Interoceanic Canal. The other beyond question and controversy belongs to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I therefore move to divide the resolutions, and to refer the first to the Committee on Interoceanic Canal and the second to the Committee on Foreign Affairs under the rule which would take it there under its character.

The SPEAKER. Even adopting the construction which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] seeks to place on the rule the Chair thinks it is perfectly competent for the House to refer this joint resolution to the Committee on an Interoceanic Canal. The resolution authorizing the appointment of that committee was introduced by unanimous consent; the rules were practically suspended at the time the resolution was adopted. The resolution provided that all bills, joint resolutions, and memorials relating to the subject of an interoceanic canal should be referred to the Select Committee on an Interoceanic Canal. The Chair therefore thinks that even under the construction stated by the gentleman from New Jersey it is competent for the House to refer this joint resolution to the Select Committee on an Interoceanic Canal in preference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, all rules which might interfere having been practically suspended when that select committee was authorized.

In the decision of the point of order the Chair is not necessitated to decide whether Rule XI is or is not, as a general proposition, suspended by permitting the House to express its views in regard to the reference of matters which from time to time may come before the House. Whenever that question shall come up directly, the Chair will be prepared to decide, and the Chair thinks the decision will be in the direction of allowing the House to control the reference of matters which it is called upon to consider to such committees as the majority may see fit. Any exercise by the Chair of the power to refer a subject to a particular committee, in violation of or in opposition to the wish of the majority of the House, would, as the Chair has heretofore said, be a tyrannical exercise of power.

Mr. ROBESON. Whenever that question comes up we will be ready to discuss it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided the question although he has expressed his views what would be proper under such circumstances.

Mr. ROBESON. But I desire to call the attention of the Chair to this proposition. The resolution agreeing to the select committee on an interoceanic canal has been read; under that resolution the committee was constituted solely for the purpose of considering subjects relating to the selection of a proper route for an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus and nothing else. It has no power in reference to international relations and complications which might arise out of the attitude of our Government toward other governments; no relation to the repeal or modification of treaties; no relation to our attitude toward Europe and the monarchies of the Old World; no relation to our allied position with other republics, or to our independent position as the dominant and responsible government of this continent.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman speaking to a point of order?

Mr. ROBESON. Yes, sir. I direct the attention of the Chair distinctly to the point that the resolution under which the committee on the subject of the interoceanic canal was organized refers only to subjects relating to the selection of a proper route for that canal. The charter of their power as a select committee has this extent, no more, and every general term in the reference of subjects to them is restrained by this limitation.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, as there has already been some discussion upon the question of reference, perhaps the House will hear me for a moment.

The SPEAKER. As discussion has been had upon the other side, the gentleman from Tennessee will be heard.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire to say but a few words, and will detain the House only a moment. I shall have no objection, so far as I am concerned, to referring this resolution to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, for I wish to have no contest with my friend from Louisiana, [Mr. KING,] but that committee has already agreed upon a resolution very widely different from this one, the tone and spirit of which I cannot indorse, because, in my judgment, it is likely to lead to serious trouble.

It seems to me that we are hurrying with inconsiderate haste to a position fraught with danger, and from which in the end we may be compelled to recede. Judging from the tone of the President's recent message on this subject and that of the resolution reported by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. KING,] we are about to declare war against the whole world, and if this declaration is to be made, I would prefer that the question should be considered by that committee of the House most properly chargeable with so grave a duty. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, it occurs to me, is the proper one to deal with the question. Besides this, the resolution which I introduce not only has reference to a canal across the Isthmus but to the shaping of an American policy toward European powers, and when we undertake so important a matter as this I think we should do so carefully and cautiously, and invite to our aid and co-operation all of our sister republics who are equally interested with us in this question. I therefore prefer that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. KING. I am a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs as well as of the select committee on the interoceanic canal. There is no war about this matter. We are only looking to the protection of our national rights and interests.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the amendment to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Interoceanic Ship-Canal.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. That is the motion of the gentleman introducing the resolution. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] (the Chair recognizes the latter gentleman as making the motion, because he is chairman of the Committee on the Interoceanic Canal) desire the reference of the resolution to that committee. This proposition comes in as an amendment. If the House desires to send the subject to the Committee on Foreign Affairs it will reach that end by voting down the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. KING.]

Mr. CONGER. Will the Chair allow me one word on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. This resolution refers only to the possibility of a canal being constructed through some one of the South American republics, on their territory. Inasmuch as the question of location would go to the Committee on the Interoceanic Ship-Canal, it seems to me eminently proper that the House should first have the recommendation of that committee on this point. Routes which are not at all embraced within the territory of any South American republic are being considered before that committee, and will be considered by the House. If the determination should be one way this resolution would have no possible effect upon the action of the House (if it should follow the committee) in reference to a proposed canal across other territory. Let that question be first settled; and then this may be a proper matter to be sent to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ROBESON. The second portion of this resolution does not refer to that canal at all; it refers to our relations with foreign governments generally.

The SPEAKER. The question of reference is for the House to determine. The Chair rules that the amendment is in order.

Mr. ROBESON. Let me ask one question of order. In disposing of this matter, is not the House governed by the rule that the question of reference to a standing committee shall be put before the reference to a select committee?

The SPEAKER. That is the order prescribed in the second clause of Rule XIII, to which the Chair will of course conform, his attention being called thereto and demand made for such preference under rule stated.

Mr. ROBESON. The question will then be put first on the motion to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The question being put, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 118, noes 30.

So the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5379) to amend the laws relating to the collection of revenue from customs; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

INTEROCEANIC SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. KING. I move the reconsideration of the vote by which the joint resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A select committee has been constituted to take into consideration the subject of an interoceanic ship-canal.

The SPEAKER. That question is no longer before the House.

Mr. KING. But there was no reconsideration of the vote upon the reference.

The SPEAKER. The spirit of the rules provides that bills and resolutions introduced under this call shall not come back upon a motion to reconsider.

Mr. CARLISLE. Besides, the gentleman did not vote with the majority.

Mr. KING. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. ROBESON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not entertain the motion to reconsider. He thinks that bills and resolutions introduced under this call cannot come back upon a motion to reconsider, and should not be subject to a motion to reconsider.

Mr. ROBESON. That is the provision of the rule.

The SPEAKER. This joint resolution has been disposed of, and to entertain now a motion to reconsider would be in violation of the spirit of the rules, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clause 2, Rule XVIII. No bill, petition, memorial, or resolution referred to a committee, or reported therefrom for printing and recommitment, shall be brought back into the House on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. KING. This does not embrace that class of subjects.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider, if carried, would bring the joint resolution back into the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask whether the action of the House is complete until the motion to reconsider is made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there would be no end to the proceedings of Monday if a member were allowed to move to reconsider any or every vote of reference of a bill to a committee.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That was for the Committee on Rules to consider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the rule bears the construction he gives to it. The same vote which referred the bill would lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and it would be an unnecessary proceeding.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If the motion had been made by the mover to reconsider and lay upon the table would the Chair have entertained it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would not on Monday under the call of States for bills for reference, the House having expressed its decision by a majority vote.

Mr. KING. But no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER. To allow motions to reconsider might occupy all the day.

Mr. KING. I do not think the power of the House is exhausted. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact there was not a quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The question of a quorum is made too late. The Chair does not think it is a fair construction of the rules existing now that a gentleman can move on Monday when a bill is introduced for reference to enter a motion to reconsider, because on a motion to reconsider he might have an hour's debate, if the original motion of reference was debatable, and that would soon exhaust the whole of Monday with a few bills. Monday has been set apart for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference. The decision of the Chair is in exact accordance with the old rule and the practice under it.

INTEROCEANIC SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. BAYNE. I submit the following resolution, and move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the project now attracting general attention, of constructing an interoceanic canal at Panama, Nicaragua, or some other suitable point in the American Isthmus, with private capital and for commercial purposes only, is worthy of high commendation; and if such project has any rival or rivals which threaten a raid on the Treasury of the United States in the interest of jobbers, neither the prostitution of the so-called Monroe doctrine, nor any other false appeal to the patriotic sentiments of the people of the United States, should prevent the approbation of the former, or the condemnation of the latter.

Resolved. That the United States, recognizing the obligation of international law in its transactions with the weakest as well as the strongest nations of the world, fearing none and desiring to do right by all, and having peaceful relations with all, which it sincerely desires to maintain, deprecates and denounces any measure or scheme calculated to infringe upon or disturb such conditions. While it will jealously guard its rights and interests, it will regard its treaty-making power as entirely adequate to secure these ends until some failure shows the contrary.

Resolved. That if, in the opinion of the President, it be necessary to take any steps to thoroughly assure and protect the rights and interests of the United States in relation to the proposed canal, he is requested to negotiate such treaties as will effect this purpose.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 252) was read a first and second time.

Mr. KING. I move to refer that to the Committee on the Interoceanic Canal.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a standing committee of the House.

Mr. KING. I raise again the question that this should go to the Committee on the Interoceanic Canal. That committee was authorized to discuss and examine into the subject of the selection of a suitable route for the construction of an interoceanic ship-canal across the Isthmus. Now, sir, in the discussion of the subject how can you divide the proposition to build such a canal through foreign territory from the proposition to consider the international relations growing out of that question? This is a project for the construction of a work through a foreign State, through foreign territory; and when this House authorized this committee to be created it was aware of that fact and voted the whole subject should go to that committee for consideration. Now, gentlemen have proposed here resolutions mixed in their character, so that the proposition to build the canal and the foreign relations which will be developed thereby come under the same resolution. How can you divide them? It is perfectly clear the entire subject belongs to the Committee on the Interoceanic Canal. The House has repeatedly so ruled; and I now move the reference of this pending proposition to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The vote will first be taken on the reference to the standing committee.

Mr. BAYNE. I should like to say one word in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana. The resolution authorizing the creation of the Committee on the Interoceanic Canal—

Mr. BUCKNER. Is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. Only by consent.

Mr. BUCKNER. I object to debate on it.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to speak to the point of order more particularly which has been raised by the gentleman from Louisiana. He seems to think all resolutions relating to the subject should go to his committee.

Mr. KING. I did not raise any point of order, but moved the reference of this resolution to the Committee on the Interoceanic Canal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion, but will first submit the motion to refer to a standing committee.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. It is whether the resolution creating the Select Committee on the Interoceanic Canal did not suspend the rule giving preference to any standing committee? The reference of a proposition is nothing but a question of what is its subject. The subject determines where the resolution should go. The reference of the resolution is determined just as soon as the Chair decides what is the subject of the resolution.

Now, this resolution clearly bears a relation to the interoceanic canal. That is a subject which the committee have been considering. They have had eminent men before them for a month or two months, and are still carefully examining the subject. Now, it is proposed to reflect upon the action of that committee unheard, by taking from them the subject embraced in the resolution which has been presented to-day, and giving it to another committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair heretofore suggested that the resolution creating this committee was by unanimous consent. It is for the House to determine.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to say a word in reply to the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois. The resolution creating the Special Committee on the Interoceanic Ship-Canal undoubtedly goes the whole length. It was intended to vest in that committee the power to select a site, to locate the canal, and perhaps to take all steps which may be necessary for its construction except the actual appropriation of money for that purpose. That is a matter which will come in afterward. My resolution, however, contemplates not that the Committee on Interoceanic Ship-Canal shall consider that matter but that the Committee on Foreign Affairs shall consider it, and that private capital, wherever it comes from, whether put in by people of our own country or from abroad, shall have the privilege of constructing the canal. And to encourage that, I want this resolution to go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and for that committee to inquire into the matter as to whether or not it is the best method for the treaty-making power of the United States to make such arrangements as will secure the rights and interests of the United States, and shut down on appropriations of money or on any job in the way of constructing this canal.

Mr. REAGAN. I voted to refer the resolution of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] and the resolution of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] to the Committee on Foreign Affairs because they related to our foreign relations, but I must vote to refer the resolution of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BAYNE] to the select committee on the Isthmus canal because it relates to that canal.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to know whether it has not been the constant practice of the Chair to determine from the subject-matter of the bill or resolution to what committee it should be referred? Whether, for instance, if it was a bill appropriating money it should not go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or to the Committee on Appropriations, as the case may be, and whether that has not been heretofore the constant practice of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already decided the point of order. He will entertain the motion to refer to the Committee on the Interoceanic Ship-Canal, but submits the question of reference first to a standing committee under the rule. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is to refer it to a standing committee. The question will first be taken on that.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 25.

Mr. KING demanded tellers.

Tellers were refused; only 14 members voting therefor.

So the motion to refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs was agreed to.

ARREARAGES OF PENSIONS.

Mr. COFFROTH introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5380) to amend the act granting arrears of pensions approved January 25, 1879; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. KIMMEL, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2485) to provide for the construction of a marine hospital in the city of Baltimore, Maryland; and the same was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. CLAFLIN. I ask that the bill I introduced this morning in reference to bankruptcy proceedings be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The bill is as follows:

A bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

DEFINITIONS.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, &c., In addition to the definitions contained in the first section of the Revised Statutes, words and phrases in this act shall mean as follows, unless inconsistent with the context:

"Bankrupt," one who has been so adjudged; "time or date of bankruptcy," or "bankruptcy" with reference to time, the time when the petition for adjudication was filed; "register," the register to whom the cause has been referred, or any one acting in his stead; "court," the district court in which the proceedings are pending, including the register; "judge," the judge of said court, not including the register; "clerk," the clerk of said court; "property," whatever passes to an assignee in bankruptcy, and all books, deeds, and writings relating thereto; "assets," all such property and its proceeds; "transfer," any payment, gift, sale, or other mode of disposing of or parting with property, or the possession of property absolutely or conditionally; "debt," any debt, demand, or liability provable in bankruptcy; "creditor," any one who owns such a debt, demand, or liability, and his duly authorized attorney or proxy; "secured creditor," a creditor who has security for such debt upon the property of the bankrupt of a nature to be assignable under this act, or who owns such a debt for which some indorser, surety, or other person, secondarily liable for the bankrupt, has such security upon the bankrupt's property; "trader" shall include all merchants, all who make it their business or a part of their business to buy or sell lands, goods, chattels, bills, bonds, notes, stocks or shares, manufacturers, warehousemen, bankers, brokers, builders, contractors, shipwrights, publishers, inn-keepers, livery-stable keepers, and all artisans who buy the materials for their business on credit.

COURTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

SEC. 2. The several district courts of the United States and of the Territories and the supreme court of the District of Columbia are constituted courts of bankruptcy within their several territorial limits.

SEC. 3. The jurisdiction conferred upon courts of bankruptcy shall extend to all adjudications of bankruptcy, to all causes, questions, and controversies arising out of any claim or demand by creditors to share in the assets of the bankrupt; to the ascertainment, adjustment, liquidation, marshaling, ranking, and disposition of all liens, charges, priorities, and specific claims on said assets; to all claims of the bankrupt to exemptions; to the bankrupt's discharge; to compositions, and to all matters and things to be done, under and in virtue of the bankruptcy, by the bankrupt or the assignee, or by any creditor who has proved his debt.

SEC. 4. Said courts, as courts of bankruptcy, shall be always open, and their powers and jurisdiction may be exercised in a summary manner, as well in vacation as in term time, and in chambers as in court, and shall include the power to compel obedience to all lawful orders and decrees in bankruptcy by process of contempt and other remedial process as fully as circuit courts may now do in equity; full power over costs, and other usual powers of courts of equity. And said courts may sit for the transaction of business in bankruptcy (when no jury is required, to be present) at any place within the district, first giving reasonable notice of the time and place of holding any such special session.

SEC. 5. In case of a vacancy in the office of district judge in any district, or in case any district judge shall, from sickness, absence, or other disability, be unable to act, the circuit justice or judge of the circuit in which such district is included may make, during such disability, absence, or vacancy, all necessary rules, orders, and decrees in bankruptcy, and cause the same to be entered, or issued, as the case may require, by the clerk of the district court.

SEC. 6. The district judge may, by consent of the parties interested, certify any point or question of law arising in bankruptcy to the circuit court for the same district, to be there heard and determined.

SEC. 7. The circuit court of each district, and the supreme court of each Territory, shall have a general superintendence and jurisdiction of all controversies and questions arising in the district court of such district or Territory sitting in bankruptcy, whether the powers and jurisdiction of a circuit court have been conferred on such district court or not, and, except when special provision is otherwise made, may, upon the certificate of the district judge, as before provided, or upon bill, petition, or other proper process of any party aggrieved, hear and determine the case as in a court of equity; and said court shall be deemed always open for this purpose; and the case may be heard by the circuit justice or the circuit judge, or both, in court or in chambers, and in term time or vacation. When a question comes up by certificate, as aforesaid, the district judge may sit at the hearing with the circuit justice or judge. In districts which are not within any organized circuit of the United States, the powers and jurisdiction of a circuit court in bankruptcy may be exercised by the district judge.

SEC. 8. The final judgment, decree, or order of the circuit court having jurisdiction, in all matters, questions, and controversies properly arising in the courts of bankruptcy, as such, in whatever mode they may be tried, shall not be reviewed by the Supreme Court, excepting upon a certificate of division of opinion between two of the justices of said circuit court.

PLENARY SUITS.

SEC. 9. The several district and circuit courts shall each have, concurrently with the courts of the States, jurisdiction of all suits at law or in equity, as distinguished from proceedings in bankruptcy, brought by an assignee in bankruptcy, in whatever district appointed, against any person, for any cause of action, or for the recovery of any debt, damages, or property vested in or claimed by him as such assignee, or by any person claiming an adverse interest against such assignee.

SEC. 10. The court of bankruptcy may direct that any debt, demand, or property claimed by the assignee shall be sued for in the appropriate court of the State.

SEC. 11. Appeals may be taken from the district to the circuit courts in all cases in equity, and writs of error may be allowed from the circuit to the district courts in cases at law such as are mentioned in the last section, when the amount in dispute exceeds $500; but no such appeal or writ of error shall be taken or allowed unless it is claimed, and notice thereof given to the clerk of the district court, to be entered with the record of proceedings, and also to the adverse party within ten days after the entry of the decree or judgment sought to be reversed, nor unless the appellant or plaintiff in error shall give bond, and comply with the other provisions of law relating to appeals and writs of error, respectively.

Such appeal, or writ of error, shall be entered in the clerk's office of the circuit court, whether in term time or vacation, within twenty days after the same is claimed, and thereupon the cause shall be deemed to be pending in said circuit court.

If the appellant or plaintiff in error fails to make entry within the time aforesaid, the appeal, or writ of error, shall be declared abandoned upon the petition of the adverse party, and notice to the appellant, or plaintiff, or his attorney of record, unless the circuit court or one of the justices thereof, shall, for cause shown, grant further time.

If such appeal or writ of error is waived in writing by the party taking the same at any time before a decision thereon, proceedings may be had in the district court as if no such appeal or writ of error had been taken or sued out.

SEC. 12. The Supreme Court shall have like appellate jurisdiction of the suits mentioned in section 9 as in other civil actions; but no appeal or writ of error shall be taken or allowed unless it is claimed, and notice thereof given to the clerk of the circuit court and to the adverse party, within ten days after entry of the decree or judgment sought to be reversed. Such claim of appeal, or for a writ of error, shall be deemed to be abandoned, unless the required bond to the adverse party, duly approved, is filed with the clerk of the circuit court within sixty days after the entry of said decree or judgment, and unless the record upon the appeal or the writ of error, as the case may be, is transmitted to the clerk of the Supreme Court for entry in said Supreme Court within ninety days after the entry of said decree or judgment.

REGISTERS.

SEC. 13. The circuit courts, two justices concurring, shall appoint within each district of their respective circuits such number of registers in bankruptcy as may be necessary for the due transaction of the business therein, not exceeding in any State one-half the number of members of Congress from that State. No person shall be eligible as a register unless he has been for at least five years a counselor of the courts of the United States or of one of the States.

Registers may be removed from office by the district judges of their respective districts; and the number of registers in any district may be from time to time diminished or increased within the limit above mentioned, as occasion requires.

SEC. 14. The register shall hold meetings, hearings, and examinations at such places and times as they shall determine, subject to any order by the judge, which times and places shall be so designated as to afford the greatest practicable facility to the suitors in bankruptcy, and shall be conformed as well as may be to the sessions of the courts of probate or other courts of the State.

SEC. 15. The registers acting in the several cases before them shall have all the powers of a master in chancery to whom a cause has been referred in equity, and may represent and act for the judge in holding meetings and conducting in chambers all administrative business or any business specially committed to them; but they shall not have power to decide a disputed adjudication, nor to issue an injunction or warrant of arrest, nor to commit for contempt. Registers may act for each other in all cases. All the acts of the registers shall be subject to review by the judge.

SUPERVISORS.

SEC. 16. There shall be appointed, for each judicial circuit, by the circuit court, sitting in any district of the circuit, two justices concurring, one supervisor in bankruptcy, whose duty it shall be to examine personally into the administration of bankruptcy proceedings under this act, throughout the circuit for which he is appointed, by registers, clerks, and assignees; to call the attention of such officers to any matters which, in his judgment, would facilitate the speedy and economical settlement of cases in bankruptcy; to report to the district court in each district within the circuit any failure on the part of any assignee promptly to discharge the duties devolving upon him under this act; to move the court for action against any delinquent assignee; and to make within the first twenty days of January, April, July, and October in each year, to the circuit court in each district within the circuit for which he is appointed, a report of his doings during the preceding three months, and of the manner in which bankruptcy proceedings are being conducted in said district, with suggestions, if any occur to him, by which the administration of bankruptcy proceedings within the district may be made more efficient and economical. The supervisor shall visit and inspect the office of every clerk and register within his circuit as often as once in every three months.

SEC. 17. Copies of the quarterly reports of supervisors shall be sent by the clerk of the circuit court, in each district, to the district judge of the district, and to the Attorney-General of the United States.

SEC. 18. All the books, accounts, and records of clerks of district courts, and of registers and assignees, shall be always subject to the examination of the supervisor in bankruptcy of the circuit, at his request.

SEC. 19. Supervisors may be removed from office by the court by which they were appointed.

SALARIES, ETC., OF SUPERVISORS AND REGISTERS.

SEC. 20. Supervisors and registers, duly appointed and acting under this act, shall receive yearly salaries at the rate of $3,000, payable quarterly from the Treasury, as judges are now paid. They shall also, in like manner, be reimbursed from the Treasury for their necessary office and traveling expenses: Provided, That the items thereof shall be verified upon oath, and shall be examined in detail, and approved in the case of registers by the district judge, and in the case of supervisors by two judges of one of the circuit courts within the circuit for which they are appointed.

ENTRY AND CLERK'S FEES.

SEC. 21. Every party, debtor or creditor, petitioning for adjudication in bankruptcy, shall, at the time of filing such petition, pay $50 into the registry of the court, and $10 to the clerk. Every assignee shall pay into the registry 1 per cent. of the gross amount of money realized from the assets in excess of $500.

The clerk shall report to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States the sums paid from time to time into the registry under this section, and transfers of all such sums received during each calendar month shall be made from the registry of the court to the Treasury of the United States, by proper orders and certificates, within ten days after the expiration thereof.

SEC. 22. The clerk shall be paid for a copy of any paper filed in the court of bankruptcy by the party ordering the same the fees now prescribed by law for other copies, except that for copies duly ordered for the use of the register the clerk shall not be paid. The clerk shall also be paid ten cents for each notice which he shall be required to send, and the actual expense of printing and publishing, necessarily incurred in any case and approved by the court. He shall make no charge for filing papers, entering orders or decrees, making dockets, or receiving or paying out money in any case in bankruptcy.

OATHS.

SEC. 23. Any oath required by this act, excepting upon a hearing in court, may be taken before a judge or clerk of a court of record of a State, or of the United States, a register in bankruptcy, a commissioner of the circuit court or a notary public, if taken within the United States; and before a minister, consul or vice-consul of the United States, if taken in a foreign country. The fee for the oath, and the certificate thereof, and preparing the statement of debt, shall be fifty cents: Provided, That no fee shall be paid to a Federal judge or register.

USE OF THE MAIL.

SEC. 24. The provisions of the fifth and sixth sections of the act, entitled "An act establishing post-roads, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1877, for the transmission of official mail matter, are hereby extended to judges, clerks, supervisors, and registers, in respect to bankruptcy business, the envelopes of such matter, in all cases, to bear appropriate indorsements containing the official designation of the officer transmitting the same, with a statement of the penalty for their misuse.

RULES.

SEC. 25. Subject to the provisions of this act, the Supreme Court shall have the like power to make and prescribe rules, forms, and modes of proceeding in bankruptcy, as they now have in relation to suits and proceedings in equity.

RECORDS.

SEC. 26. The proceedings in all cases of bankruptcy shall be deemed matters of record, but the same shall not be required to be recorded at large, but shall be carefully filed, kept, and numbered in the office of the clerk of the court, and a docket only, or short memorandum thereof, shall be kept in books to be provided for that purpose, which shall be open to public inspection.

WARRANTS.

SEC. 27. At any time before or within three months after the adjudication, upon proof being made, by affidavit to the satisfaction of the judge, that any bankrupt or person against whom proceedings in bankruptcy are pending is about to leave the district, and that his departure will hinder, impair or delay the proceedings therein, the judge may issue his warrant to the marshal, directing him to arrest said bankrupt, or supposed bankrupt, and him safely keep until he shall give bail or recognizance in a sum to be specified in said warrant for his appearance from time to time, as required by the court, and for his obedience to all lawful orders of the court in said proceedings.

The judge may at any time, after adjudication and before the assignee is chosen, in any case, upon the application of the bankrupt or of any creditor, issue a warrant to the marshal, requiring him to take possession of the property of the bankrupt, and keep the same safely for the assignee, when appointed.

He may issue a like warrant to seize and keep the property of any person against whom proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, and before adjudication, upon satisfactory evidence by affidavit that he is about to remove, conceal, or transfer his property in fraud of his creditors or of this act.

SEC. 28. The judge may appoint a receiver before adjudication, or before the assignee is chosen, when there appears to be a necessity therefor.

INJUNCTIONS.

SEC. 29. The circuit and district courts of the district wherein any involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy are pending, may before adjudication, by injunction, restrain any person from intermeddling with the property of the supposed bankrupt. The judge in bankruptcy shall have the like power in respect to the supposed bankrupt.

Said courts may likewise restrain creditors from prosecuting actions to final judgment contrary to this act, or may permit such actions to proceed for such purposes and under such restrictions and limitations as shall be found just.

HEARINGS.

SEC. 30. All hearings and examinations in bankruptcy shall, unless otherwise ordered by the judge, be oral, and the register shall report the substance of the evidence, if so requested. When the bankrupt is examined the court may, if the importance of the case seems to require it, order a sworn stenographer to be employed, at the expense of the estate, to take down the evidence. In any hearing or examination a party interested may employ a stenographer, who shall be duly sworn; and the court may, afterward, for cause shown, order the necessary expense of his employment, or some part thereof, to be paid out of the assets.

TIME.

SEC. 31. In all cases in which any particular number of days is prescribed by this title, or shall be mentioned in any rule or order of court, or general order which shall at any time be made under this title, for the doing of any act or for any other purpose, the same shall be reckoned, in the absence of any expression to the contrary, exclusive of the first and inclusive of the last day, unless the last day shall fall on a Sunday, Christmas day, or on any day appointed by the President of the United States as a day of public fast or thanksgiving, or on the 4th of July, in which case the time shall be reckoned exclusive of that day also. The filing of the petition for adjudication shall be deemed the commencement of proceedings under this act.

VOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY.

SEC. 32. Any person residing within the jurisdiction of the United States, owing debts provable under this act exceeding the amount of $300, may apply, by petition, to the judge of the judicial district in which such debtor has resided or carried on business for the six months next preceding the time of filing such petition, or for the longest period during such six months, setting forth his place of residence and of business, his indebtedness to said amount, his willingness to surrender all his estate and effects for the benefit of his creditors, and his desire to obtain a discharge under this act.

He shall annex to, or file with, his petition, a schedule containing a full and true statement of all his debts and liabilities, exhibiting, as far as possible, the name and residence of each creditor, and if unknown, the fact to be so stated; the nature, amount, and consideration of each debt and liability, and where contracted, and of any mortgage, pledge, lien, charge, collateral, or other security given for the payment of the same.

He shall, in like manner, annex or file an inventory, containing an accurate statement and description of all his estate assignable under this act, and of the cash value thereof, and of all incumbrances thereon, and of all which he claims as exempt.

The schedule and inventory shall be verified by the oath of the petitioner. SEC. 33. The filing of such a petition, as last aforesaid, shall be an act of bankruptcy, and shall be conclusive evidence of the petitioner's indebtedness to the requisite amount, and of his inability to pay; and upon the filing thereof, the clerk of the court shall, under the directions of the court, special or general, adjudge such petitioner to be a bankrupt, designate a register to have charge of the cause, and appoint a time and place for the first general meeting of the creditors of said bankrupt for the proof of debts, and the choice of an assignee or assignees, before the judge or before said register, and give notice of such adjudication and meeting, and of the purposes thereof, by publication in one or more newspapers, to be designated by the judge, having regard to the circumstances of the case, and by mail to all known creditors of the petitioner; and the notice to creditors shall state the facts aforesaid, and the names and residences of the creditors, and amounts due them, so far as known. Said meeting shall be held not less than ten nor more than sixty days after adjudication.

If a bankrupt dies after adjudication, the proceedings may go forward as if he had lived.

INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY.

SEC. 34. Any person residing and owing debts, as aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, departs from the State, District, or Territory of which he is an inhabitant, with intent to defraud his creditors, or, being absent, remains so with like intent, or conceals himself to avoid arrest or the service of legal process issued or feared, or makes a fraudulent transfer of his property or conceals or removes the same to avoid process, or with intent to defraud his creditors procures or suffers judgment against him, or gives a warrant to confess judgment, or judgment note with like intent, or who, having been arrested in any civil action, fails or neglects to give bail, or in some other mode to procure his discharge, for twenty days, or fails to dissolve an attachment laid upon his property in a civil action for a like period, or fails for sixty days to satisfy a final judgment or decree rendered against him for the payment of money, or who, being a trader, has suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper or open accounts, made, passed, or contracted in the course of his business, for a period of thirty days after the same were payable, or who, being insolvent, makes a preference to any creditor as hereinafter defined, or makes an assignment for the benefit of existing creditors, with or without preferences, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and may be adjudged bankrupt by any court of bankruptcy wherein he might have been made bankrupt on his own application, upon a petition filed in such court by three or more of his creditors whose debts, which would be provable at the first meeting under this act, amount in all to not less than $250; or, if his creditors are less than twelve in number, by not less than one-fourth in number of his creditors, having debts to said amount: Provided, Such petition is brought within a period of three months after the act of bankruptcy has been committed. When such act consists of a transfer of or attachment or lien upon property of the bankrupt, such period shall not be deemed to expire until three months from and after the recording, registering, or docketing of the deed, writing, transfer, judgment, or attachment relating thereto, whenever by law such recording, registering, or docketing is required or permitted, or from the notorious, exclusive and continuous possession by the creditor, or other person dealing with the bankrupt, of the personal property which is the subject-matter of such alleged act of bankruptcy.

SEC. 35. In involuntary cases it shall be no objection to the jurisdiction of the court that the debtor has removed from the United States since the act of bankruptcy was committed, provided the petition is brought in a district in which he might have filed his petition at the time of his removal.

SEC. 36. Upon a petition being filed by creditors for adjudication, and cause shown by affidavit, in the petition or otherwise, the court, if satisfied with the proof, shall grant an order of notice to the debtor, requiring him to show cause thereon at a court of bankruptcy to be held before the judge not less than ten days thereafter. Such order shall contain a copy of the petition, or shall state the substance thereof, and be served not less than five days before the return day, as process is served in other civil actions; and the order shall require notice by publication as therein directed, if the debtor is not found and has no usual place of abode within the district. The cause shall proceed and be tried summarily and as speedily as may be after due service has been made to the satisfaction of the judge. The debtor may, on the day when he is bound to appear, demand a trial by jury, which shall then be had at the first convenient opportunity, and the judge may summon a jury for such purpose if the urgency of the case appears to justify it.

Any creditor of the supposed bankrupt may be admitted as a co-petitioner by filing with the clerk, at any time before the hearing, notice that he wishes to be so admitted, or may be admitted by the court during the hearing. Any person interested to defeat the petition may be admitted to defend.

If the issue is found against the petitioners the petition shall be dismissed; but it shall not be dismissed for want of prosecution or by consent of parties, unless the judge is satisfied that the parties consenting are the only parties interested, or that the acts of bankruptcy have not been committed, or that no interests of creditors can be prejudiced by such dismissal; and to ascertain these facts notice may be required by publication, or the debtor may be required to file a schedule of his creditors, and notice may be given them by mail, or otherwise, as the judge may direct.

SEC. 37. If the debtor shall make default, or if upon the trial the issue shall be decided against him, he shall be adjudged a bankrupt, and shall file within five days thereafter the schedule and inventory above required to be filed by petitioners for the benefit of the act. If he has not appeared in person or by attorney, such notice to file the schedule and inventory shall be given him as the court may order, before he shall be deemed guilty of contempt. If he fails to file these papers in due time, the petitioning creditors shall cause them to be prepared according to the best of their information, and file the same. Upon such filing, in either case, or upon the order of the judge, the first meeting shall be called, and further proceedings shall be had as in cases of voluntary bankruptcy.

FIRST MEETING—CHOICE AND QUALIFICATION OF ASSIGNEES.

SEC. 38. At the first meeting of creditors the clerk shall make return of the notices published and given, and if they are insufficient the register shall adjourn the meeting, and the defects of notice shall be supplied. When due notice has been given the meeting shall be held, and the creditors may prove their debts and choose one or more assignees of the estate of the debtor, the choice to be made by the greater part in value, and not less than one-third in number, of the creditors voting; but creditors shall not vote upon privileged or contingent debts, nor shall a creditor who has received an unlawful preference prove or vote on any debt, unless he shall surrender his preference to the register for the use of the assignee; nor any secured creditor, unless he shall in like manner surrender his security, or unless the register shall find that the excess of his debt above his security must be at least a certain sum, in which case he may vote on that amount.

SEC. 39. Every assignee shall qualify within ten days after his election by giving bond to the United States in such sum and with such sureties as shall be satisfactory to the court, conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties, which shall be filed with the records of the case, and may be prosecuted from time to time in the name and at the charge of any person injured by a breach of the condition thereof; joint assignees may give joint or several bonds, as they shall elect. If any assignee shall fail so to qualify within the time aforesaid he shall be deemed to have declined the trust.

POWERS OF COURT IN RESPECT TO ASSIGNEES.

SEC. 40. The judge may refuse to confirm an assignee; or may add assignees to those chosen; he may remove an assignee for cause, after hearing; he may punish, as for contempt, an assignee who disobeys a lawful order of the court; he may fill all vacancies in the office of assignee caused by death, resignation or otherwise, if he finds that the vacancy needs to be filled. The register may appoint an assignee when there is a failure to elect one, and no objection is made to his exercising such power.

COMMITTEE OF DIRECTION.

SEC. 41. The creditors at the first meeting may, if they please, by a vote such as is required for the choice of an assignee, elect a committee of three persons, whether creditors or not, subject to the approval of the court, who shall be called the committee of direction, whose duty it shall be to advise the assignee in the disposal of the assets, the admission of debts, payment of claims having priority, declaration of dividends and the settlement of the estate in all respects, with a view to the best interests of the creditors; and all sales made, suits brought or acts done by him in good faith, with their written consent, or that of the major part of them, shall be, prima facie, deemed expedient and proper; but all such acts shall be subject to the supervision, control, and direction of the court. In case of a neglect or failure to elect such a committee, the court may, at any time, appoint one, if found expedient, upon the application of not less than one-third in value of the creditors whose debts have been proved.

SEC. 42. No action or advice, nor the failure to act or advise on the part of the committee of direction, shall affect the title or right of any one dealing with or sued by the assignee, nor shall it be given in evidence, excepting in the court of bankruptcy, and when the conduct or fees of the assignee or the settlement of the estate is in question therein.

TITLE VESTED IN ASSIGNEES.

SEC. 43. When an assignee has been duly appointed and qualified, there shall vest in him, for the purposes of this act, all the property and estate of every kind, except as hereafter provided, which the bankrupt had at the commencement of the proceedings, including everything of value which he could then by any means have sold, assigned, or conveyed, or which might have been taken on execution upon any judgment against him; all his interest in any patents, patent-rights, or copyrights; all rights in action arising from contract, or from the unlawful taking or detention of or injury to his property; all powers which he might have exercised for his own benefit; all books, deeds, or writings relating to the above-mentioned property; all property conveyed by him in fraud of his creditors; and the assignee shall have the right to avoid any transfer which the creditors of the bankrupt or any of them might by any way or means have then avoided; and the estate in his hands shall not be subject to any liens, charges or incumbrances which, for want of record or otherwise, would not then have been valid as against the creditors of the bankrupt or any of them; and every attachment, levy, seizure, garnishment, charge or lien existing upon the property of the bankrupt, by virtue of any judgment, process, or proceeding against him by any creditor or creditors, at law or in equity, entered, levied, or laid within three months before the bankruptcy, such period to be reckoned as herein provided in relation to acts of bankruptcy, shall be dissolved by such adjudication and appointment, and the money or property in the hands of any officer arising from such levy or seizure shall be the property of the assignee: Provided, That all the legal and taxable costs and charges of the creditor and officer in respect to any such levy, attachment, judgment, or seizure, or in the suit in which it was levied or laid, incurred in good faith, shall be a first lien upon the property affected thereby, and the court of bankruptcy shall have power to ascertain the amount of such costs and charges, and to order their payment out of such property before or after the assignee shall be put in possession thereof as shall seem most just and expedient.

EXEMPTED PROPERTY—ALLOWANCES TO BANKRUPTS.

SEC. 44. There shall be excepted and exempted out of the property mentioned in the preceding section, and shall be set apart by the court of bankruptcy, for the use of the bankrupt, the necessary and proper wearing apparel of the bankrupt, and that of his wife and children; his uniform, arms, and equipment as a soldier in the service, past or present, of the Army of the United States, or the militia; such other property as is or may be exempted from attachment, seizure, or levy by the laws of the United States; and such other as was so exempted by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt was domiciled when the proceedings in bankruptcy were begun, not exceeding, in the case of traders, the value of $500. And the court may allow the bankrupt a sum of money not exceeding $500 for his support pending the proceedings, if his circumstances require it.

He shall also be allowed reasonable wages for services rendered his estate at the request of his assignee, and the usual fees for his attendance as a witness when required to attend for his own examination, or in any other matter, excepting at the hearing on the question of his discharge.

DUTIES OF BANKRUPT.

SEC. 45. The bankrupt shall, at the request of the assignee and at the expense of the estate, make and execute any instruments, deeds, and writings which may be proper to enable the assignee to possess himself fully of all the assets vested in him, and do all acts which may be reasonably required by the assignee or ordered by the court in the due settlement of his estate. He shall attend the first meeting of creditors, and such other meetings as he may be duly notified to attend.

EXAMINATIONS.

SEC. 46. The bankrupt shall, when required by the court, at any time before his application for a discharge, attend before the register or a commissioner, to be designated by the court, for examination by the assignee or by creditors touching his trade and dealings, his property and debts, and all matters which may affect the settlement of his estate in bankruptcy.

Upon cause shown by affidavit the court may summon the wife of the bankrupt, or any person suspected of having any assets of the bankrupt in his possession, or to have knowledge of anything material whatsoever relating to the assets or dealings of the bankrupt, to appear and submit to an examination in like manner. If the bankrupt's wife fails to attend after due notice, the bankrupt shall not be entitled to a discharge, unless he proves to the satisfaction of the court that he was unable to procure her attendance.

POWERS, ETC., OF ASSIGNEES.

SEC. 47. A copy of the adjudication and of the record of the assignee's appointment shall be conclusive evidence of his title and powers as to all the matters aforesaid, and of his right to demand, receive, sue for, and recover the assets and to set aside frauds; and this whether he is chosen at the first meeting or appointed by the judge or register, or fills a vacancy. As soon as conveniently may be after the assignee qualifies, the judge or register shall give him a certificate of his appointment, under his hand and the seal of the court, and such certificate shall likewise be conclusive evidence, as aforesaid.

SEC. 48. The assignee shall have the like remedy to recover all the estate, debts, and effects in his own name as the debtor would have had if the decree in bankruptcy had not been rendered. If at the time of the bankruptcy an action is pending in the name of the debtor for the recovery of a debt or other thing which might or ought to pass to the assignee by the assignment, the assignee shall, if he requires it, be admitted to prosecute the action in his own name, in like manner and with like effect as if it had been originally commenced by him. And if any suit at law or in equity, in which the bankrupt is a party defendant, is then pending which in any way concerns the creditors, the assignee may defend the same in the same manner and with the like effect as it might have been defended by the bankrupt.

SEC. 49. No suit pending in the name of the assignee shall be abated by his death or removal; but upon the motion of the surviving or remaining or new assignee, as the case may be, he shall be admitted to prosecute the suit in like manner and with like effect as if it had been originally commenced by him.

SEC. 50. No person shall be entitled, as against the assignee, to withhold from him possession of any books or account of the bankrupt, or claim any lien thereon.

SEC. 51. The assignee shall immediately give notice of his appointment by publication at least once a week for three successive weeks in such newspaper or newspapers as shall be designated by the court, due regard being had to their general circulation in the district, or in that part of the district in which the bankrupt and his creditors shall reside, and shall, within six months, cause the certificate of his appointment to be recorded in every registry of deeds or other office within the United States where a conveyance of any lands owned by the bankrupt ought by law to be recorded.

SEC. 52. The assignee shall, as soon as may be, after receiving any money belonging to the estate, deposit the same in some bank in his name as assignee.

SEC. 53. When it appears that the distribution of the estate may be delayed by litigation or other cause, the court may direct the temporary investment of the money belonging to such estate in securities to be approved by the judge or register, or may authorize it to be deposited in any convenient bank upon such interest, not exceeding the legal rate, as the bank may contract with the assignee, to pay thereon.

SEC. 54. The assignee, under the direction of the court, may submit any controversy arising in the settlement of demands against the estate, or of debts due to it, to the determination of arbitrators, to be chosen by him and the other party to the controversy, and under such direction may compound and settle any such controversy, by agreement with the other party, as he thinks proper and most for the interest of the creditors.

SEC. 55. The judge may, in his discretion, for cause shown, and upon notice and hearing, direct the receiver or assignee to take possession of the property, and carry on the business of the debtor, or any part thereof, under the direction of the judge, when, in his judgment, the interest of the estate as well as of the creditors will be promoted thereby, but not for a period exceeding twelve months from the time the debtor shall have been declared a bankrupt: Provided, That such order shall not be made until the judge shall be satisfied that it is approved by a majority in value of the creditors. When a composition is offered before the appointment of an assignee, the judge may make such order in respect to the continuance of the business by the debtor, with or without supervision, or by a receiver, as shall seem to him expedient, and for the interest of all parties.

SEC. 56. Unless otherwise ordered by the court, or the committee of direction, the assignee shall sell the property, whether real or personal, at public auction, in such parts or parcels, and at such times and places, as shall be best calculated to produce the greatest amount with the least expense. All notices of public sales under this act by any assignee or officer of the court shall be published once a week for three consecutive weeks in the newspaper or newspapers to be designated by the court, which, in his opinion, shall be best calculated to give general notice of the sale. And the judge, on the application of any party in interest, shall have complete supervisory power over sales by assignees, including the power to set aside the same and to order a resale, so that the property sold shall realize the largest sum. And the court may, in its discretion, order any real estate of the bankrupt, or any part thereof, to be sold for one-fourth cash at the time of sale, and the residue within twelve months, in such installments and bearing such interest as the court may direct, and secured by proper mortgage or lien upon the property so sold.

SEC. 57. It shall be the duty of every assignee to keep a regular account of all moneys received or expended by him as such assignee, to which account every creditor shall, at reasonable times, have free access.

SEC. 58. Whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the judge that the title to any portion of an estate, real or personal, which has come into possession of the assignee, is in dispute, the judge may, upon the petition of the assignee, and after such notice to the claimant, his agent, or attorney, as the court shall deem reasonable, order it to be sold, under the direction of the assignee, who shall hold the funds received in place of the estate disposed of; and the proceeds of the sale shall be considered the measure of the value of the property in any suit or controversy between the parties in any court. But this provision shall not prevent the recovery of the property from the possession of the assignee by any proper action commenced at any time before the court orders the sale.

SEC. 59. No suit, either at law or in equity, shall be maintainable in any court between an assignee in bankruptcy and a person claiming an adverse interest, touching any property or rights of property transferable to or vested in such assignee, unless brought within two years from the time when the cause of action accrued for or against such assignee. This provision shall not in any case revive a right of action barred at the time when an assignee is appointed.

DEBTS.

SEC. 60. The following debts and liabilities, and no others, shall be provable in bankruptcy: All debts absolutely due by the bankrupt at the commencement of the proceedings, with any interest which would have been recoverable thereon at that date, or with a rebate of interest upon such as were not then payable, and do not bear interest by the terms of the contract; all damages suffered by reason of the rejection by the assignee of a lease, as hereinafter provided; all demands for or on account of any goods or chattels wrongfully taken, converted, or withheld by the bankrupt, to the amount of their value, with interest; all unliquidated damages arising out of any contract or promise, express or implied; the amount of all such demands and damages, and of all equitable debts, to be assessed in such mode as the court shall direct; all taxable costs incurred in good faith by a creditor before the bankruptcy, in an action to recover a provable debt, may be added to the proof thereof; all costs then taxable against a plaintiff who shall become bankrupt upon a cause of action which would pass to the assignee, and which the assignee declines to prosecute after notice. If judgment is obtained upon a provable debt pending the proceedings, the debt and costs to the time of bankruptcy may be proved, as if no judgment had been obtained. If the bankrupt shall be bound as drawer, indorser, surety, bail, or guarantor upon any bill, note, bond, specialty, or contract, or for the debt of another, the creditor may prove the same at any time after the liability shall become fixed, and before the final dividend shall be declared. In all cases of contingent debts and contingent liabilities contracted by the bankrupt, and not herein otherwise provided for, the creditor may make claim therefor and have his claim allowed, with the right to share in the dividends, if the contingency shall happen before the order for the final dividend; or he may apply to the court seasonably before such final order, to have the value of the debt or liability ascertained and liquidated, which shall then be done in such manner as the court shall direct, and he may prove for the amount so ascertained. If the court shall find such debt or liability incapable of valuation, a decree to that effect shall be entered upon the record.

LEASES, RENTS.

SEC. 61. The bankrupt shall not be entitled to the benefits, nor be bound by the covenants or engagements, of any lease held by him at the time of his bankruptcy, but such lease shall be deemed to be surrendered, so far as he is personally concerned. The assignee may decline the lease at any time, notwithstanding that he may have endeavored to sell the same, or have exercised acts of ownership in respect thereto: Provided, That the landlord or any creditor may, in writing, require him to elect, within twenty days after such notice, whether to accept or decline the same, and the failure to accept within such time shall be deemed a declination. When a lease is declined, the landlord may have any damages he shall suffer thereby assessed, as the court shall direct, and prove the amount as a debt in the bankruptcy. Such declination shall not affect any right of the assignee to deal with fixtures belonging to the bankrupt.

PREFERRED CREDITORS.

SEC. 62. Any person who, after the passage of this act, has accepted a preference, having reasonable cause to believe that the same was made or given by the debtor contrary to any provisions thereof, shall not prove any debt or claim against the estate of the debtor, nor receive any dividend therefrom, until he shall first surrender to the assignee all property, money, benefit, or advantage received by him or for his benefit under such preference.

SURETIES.

SEC. 63. Any person liable as bail, surety, guarantor, or otherwise for the bankrupt, who shall have paid the debt, or any part thereof, in discharge of the whole, shall be entitled to prove such debt, or to stand in the place of the creditor, if the creditor has proved the same, although such payments shall have been made after the proceedings in bankruptcy were begun. And any person so liable for the bankrupt and who has not paid the whole of such debt, but is still liable for the same, or any part thereof, may, if the creditor fails or omits to prove such debt, prove the same, in the name of the creditor, if known, if not, in his own name, and the court shall see that the dividend is so paid as to diminish the original debt.

SECURED CREDITORS.

SEC. 64. A secured creditor shall prove only for the excess of the debt after deducting the value of his security, to be ascertained by agreement between him and the assignee, or by a sale or appraisal thereof, to be made in such manner as the court shall direct; or the creditor may surrender such property to the register or assignee, and be admitted to prove his whole debt. If the value of the property exceeds the sum for which it is so held as security, the assignee may release to the creditor the bankrupt's right of redemption therein on receiving such excess; or he may sell the property, subject to the claim of the creditor thereon; and in either case the assignee and creditor, respectively, shall execute all deeds and writings necessary or proper to consummate the transaction. If the property is not so sold, valued, appraised, or surrendered, the creditor shall not be allowed nor required to prove any part of his debt. If, however, such creditor shall have sold the property in good faith, in accordance with the terms of his contract, he may be admitted as a creditor for the excess of his debt, after giving credit for what he has received, and so much more, if anything, as he would have received if a sale or valuation had been made in accordance with this act.

SEC. 65. When the bankrupt, at the time of adjudication, is liable upon any bill of exchange, promissory note, or other obligation, in respect of distinct contracts, as a member of two or more firms carrying on separate and distinct trades, and having distinct estates to be wound up in bankruptcy, or as a sole trader, and also as a member of a firm, the circumstance that such firms are in whole or in part composed of the same individuals, or that the sole contractor is also one of the joint contractors, shall not prevent proof and receipt of dividend in respect of such distinct contracts against the estates respectively liable upon such contracts.

SET-OFF.

SEC. 66. In all cases of mutual debts or mutual credits between the parties, the account between them shall be stated, and one debt set off against the other, and the balance only shall be allowed or paid, but no set-off shall be allowed in favor of any debtor to the bankrupt of a claim, in its nature not provable against the estate, or of a claim purchased by or transferred to him after the filing of the petition, or within three months before such filing, if purchased with a view to such set-off, and with knowledge, or notice, that the future bankrupt is insolvent, or has committed an act of bankruptcy.

PROOF OF DEBTS.

SEC. 67. Debts offered for proof must be verified by a statement in writing, under oath, and signed by the deponent, setting forth the demand, the consideration thereof, whether any and what securities are held therefor, and whether any and what payments have been made thereon; and that the sum claimed is justly due from the bankrupt to the claimant. Such oath shall be made by the claimant, testifying of his own knowledge, unless he is absent from the United States, or prevented by some other good cause from testifying, in which case the demand may be verified by the attorney or authorized agent of the claimant testifying to the best of his knowledge, information, and belief, and setting forth his means of knowledge. The statement shall be delivered or sent by mail to the register.

SEC. 68. If the proof is satisfactory to the register, it shall, if offered at the first meeting, be declared admitted; if after the first meeting, he shall deliver or send it to the assignee, who shall examine the same and compare it with the books and accounts of the bankrupt, and shall register the names of creditors who have proved their claims, the time of each proof, and the amount and nature of the debt, in a book which shall be open to the inspection of all the creditors. The court may require or receive further pertinent evidence either for or against the admission of any debt.

SEC. 69. The court may suspend the proof of any debt offered at the first meeting, if it entertains doubts of its validity, or may admit it, for the purposes of the meeting, at less than the amount claimed, if the doubt affects the amount only.

REVISION OF PROOFS.

SEC. 70. The court may, on the application of the assignee, or of any creditor, or of the bankrupt, or without any application, examine upon oath the bankrupt, or any person tendering or who has made proof of a claim, and may summon any person capable of giving evidence concerning such proof, or concerning the debt sought to be proved, and may reject, modify, or expunge all claims and proofs, according to the justice of the case.

SEC. 71. Any one aggrieved by the action of the register allowing, disallowing, or expunging a debt offered for proof, or any part thereof, may, in his application to the judge for a review of such action, demand a trial by jury, if the claim is one which would between solvent parties be triable in that mode; and if he shall not demand a jury, the other party may do so at the time of entering his appearance. Such trial shall be had in the circuit or district court, whichever has or will soonest have a jury in attendance. If in the district court, all rulings of law may be reviewed by the circuit court by writ of error if the sum in dispute exceeds $500. If the dispute is tried by the judge and exceeds that amount, his decision may be reviewed by the circuit court under its supervisory power. The decision of the circuit court in any case shall be final.

SEC. 72. All creditors whose debts are duly proved and allowed shall be entitled to share in the bankrupt's property and estate pro rata, except as provided in the following section.

PRIVILEGED DEBTS.

SEC. 73. The following claims shall have priority and be first paid in full in their order: First. The 1 per cent. upon the gross assets for the use of the United States, as provided in section 21. Second. The costs and charges of the proceedings, including the entry fee of $60, when not paid by the bankrupt, and all costs duly charged against the assets. Third. Debts, taxes, and assessments due to the United States which have been proved. Fourth. Debts, taxes, and assessments made under the laws of the State where the proceedings are pending and debts due such State, when by the laws thereof such debts have priority against insolvent debtors. Fifth. Wages due any workman, clerk, or servant of the bankrupt for labor performed within six months before the bankruptcy, not exceeding $50. Sixth. Debts due to any person who by the laws of the United States is entitled to priority. And nothing in this act contained shall interfere with the assessment and collection of taxes by the authority of the United States or of any State.

SEC. 74. The court may at any time, after the adjudication, order payment, in whole or in part, of privileged debts, according to their rank, without formal declaration of a dividend.

ACCOUNTS OF ASSIGNEES.

SEC. 75. Immediately upon the expiration of six months from the time of his appointment, or earlier, if practicable, the assignee shall file in the clerk's office an account of his receipts and payments, and a statement of the situation of the estate, and a list of all debts proved since the first meeting, with the names and residences of the creditors. He shall at the same time file a duplicate of the account and statement with the register. Thereupon a second meeting of creditors shall be called, if the court thinks it expedient to call one, or if the assignee or any creditor requests it, at which the account shall be examined by the creditors and be passed upon by the register, and debts which have been proved may be re-examined, after notice to the proving creditor, as heretofore provided. Such meeting shall be notified by the clerk to all known creditors, with a summary statement of the matters to be considered thereat. If a meeting is not asked for or thought necessary, a hearing shall be had upon the said account, of which notice shall be given, by publication or otherwise, or without notice, as the court shall order. Similar proceedings shall be had at the end of every six months until the estate is fully settled.

SEC. 76. The assignee shall be allowed, from the assets in his hands, all his necessary disbursements and a reasonable compensation for his services, having regard to the circumstances of the case, not exceeding the rate of compensation allowed for similar services by the courts of the State in which the proceedings are pending.

DIVIDENDS.

SEC. 77. Whenever, after the settlement of any assignee's account, there are funds applicable to a dividend, the court shall order a dividend to be declared, reserving, however, sufficient funds to meet all claims which, by reason of their nature, or the distant residence of the creditor, or other sufficient reason, have not been proved and allowed: Provided, That a final settlement of the estate shall not be delayed for the proof of contingent liabilities which the creditor has not required the court to value, unless the judge shall make a special order to that effect. The assignee shall prepare a dividend sheet in duplicate, and file one copy thereof in court, and shall notify and pay the creditors in such mode as the court shall order.

UNCLAIMED DIVIDENDS.

SEC. 78. Dividends which remain unclaimed for six months after the final dividend has been declared shall be then paid by the assignee into the registry of the court, and the court shall take all reasonable means to cause their payment to the creditors entitled thereto, and dividends remaining unclaimed in the registry for the space of six years shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

PREFERENCES, AND FRAUDS ON THE ACT.

SEC. 79. Any debtor who, being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, shall procure any part of his property to be taken, attached, or sequestered on legal process, or shall, directly or indirectly, assist in the recovery of any judgment against him, or make any payment or transfer of his property, with a view to prefer any creditor or person having any claim against him or who is under any liability for him, shall be deemed to have made a fraudulent preference; and if the same shall have been made within three months before the debtor's bankruptcy, and the person receiving such preference or to be benefited thereby, or his agent, shall have reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on this act was intended, the preference shall be voidable by the assignee, who may recover the property or its value from such creditor or other person: Provided, That when a creditor has been preferred and afterward in good faith gives the debtor further credit, without security of any kind, for money or goods which are used in the debtor's business, the amount of such new credit remaining unpaid at the bankruptcy may be deducted from the amount which would otherwise be recoverable from the preferred creditor.

If any such debtor as aforesaid, within the period aforesaid, shall do any of the things above mentioned with intent to prevent the property dealt with or affected from coming to his assignee in bankruptcy, or to defeat, delay, impair, hinder or evade the operation of this act, the person dealing with such debtor, or any one acting for such person, having reasonable cause to believe that a fraud on this act was intended, the assignee may recover the property or its value from such person.

The fact that a transfer was not made in the ordinary course of the debtor's business shall be prima facie evidence of fraud on his part, and of a reasonable cause of belief thereof by the other party.

The period of three months shall be reckoned in the same manner as is herein provided in respect to acts of bankruptcy.

If a debtor shall, directly or indirectly, pay money or transfer property to an attorney at law, for services to be rendered him in bankruptcy, beyond a reasonable retainer, and thereafter becomes bankrupt, such payment shall be a preference, and the assignee may recover the amount by summary process.

PROTECTION OF BANKRUPT.

SEC. 80. No creditor whose debt is provable shall be allowed to prosecute to final judgment any suit at law or in equity therefor against the bankrupt, until the question of the debtor's discharge shall have been determined; and any such suit or proceedings shall, upon the application of the bankrupt, be staid to await the determination of the court in bankruptcy on the question of the discharge: Provided, There is no unreasonable delay on the part of the bankrupt in endeavoring to obtain his discharge: And provided also, That if the amount due the creditor is in dispute, the suit, by leave of the court in bankruptcy, may proceed to judgment for the purpose of ascertaining the amount due, which amount may be proved in bankruptcy, but execution shall be staid until the time aforesaid.

SEC. 81. No bankrupt shall be liable during the pendency of the proceedings in bankruptcy to arrest in any civil action, unless the same is founded on some debt or claim from which his discharge in bankruptcy would not release him.

DISCHARGE.

SEC. 82. The bankrupt may, not less than six nor more than eighteen months after the adjudication, apply to the court for a discharge from his debts. If all his debts do not exceed $2,000, or if no debt has been proved against his estate, he may apply after sixty days. A hearing on the application shall be had by the judge, if convenient, and, if not, by the register, after notice by mail to all known creditors, and by publication in one or more newspapers, as the court may direct.

SEC. 83. It shall be a valid objection to the bankrupt's discharge that he has done anything which is made criminal by this act; or has given an illegal preference which has not been surrendered; or, being a trader whose annual transactions exceed $5,000, has failed to keep proper books of account; or that he has without valid excuse failed to obey any order of the court.

SEC. 84. The hearing shall be conducted like other hearings under this act and be subject to like revision. All creditors whose debts would be barred by the discharge shall be entitled to be heard and to examine the bankrupt, who shall be personally present, unless prevented by some cause satisfactory to the court. No formal pleadings shall be required, but record shall be made of any charges of fraud or other allegations made in opposition to the discharge.

SEC. 85. If upon the hearing and trial it shall be found that the bankrupt has conformed to his duty under this act, and has done nothing which should operate to prevent his discharge, the same shall be granted, and a certificate thereof shall be given him, under the seal of the court, in substance as follows, but which may be varied as the circumstances of any case may require:

DISTRICT COURT OF THE UNITED STATES,

District of ———:

Whereas ——— has been duly adjudged a bankrupt under the Revised Statutes of the United States, title "Bankruptcy," and appears to have conformed to all the requirements of law in that behalf, it is therefore ordered by the court that said ——— be forever discharged from all debts and claims which by said title are made provable against his estate, and which existed on the ——— day of ———, on which day the petition for adjudication was filed by (or against) him; excepting such debts, if any, as are by law excepted from the operation of a discharge in bankruptcy.

Given under my hand and the seal of the court at ———, in the said district, this ——— day of ———.

[SEAL.]

—————, Judge.

The certificate, or an authenticated copy thereof, or of the order for a discharge, shall be conclusive evidence of the fact and regularity of the discharge, and of the jurisdiction of the court granting the same, and may be pleaded in bar by a simple averment that it was granted on the day of its date.

SEC. 86. A discharge duly granted shall release the bankrupt from all provable debts, excepting such as were created by his fraud or embezzlement, or by his defalcation as a public officer, or while acting as a trustee, assignee in bankruptcy, or in some other fiduciary character; and excepting such as were not described in his schedule or some amendment thereof in season for effectual proof, with the name of the creditor, if known to the bankrupt, unless the creditor had notice or actual knowledge of the bankruptcy. The discharge shall likewise release the bankrupt from all collateral covenants and promises in respect to debts or the security for debts which are discharged.

SEC. 87. No discharge shall release or discharge any person liable for the same debt for or with the bankrupt as partner, joint contractor, indorser, surety, or otherwise.

REVIEW OF DISCHARGE.

SEC. 88. The order granting a discharge may be reviewed and annulled by the judge in bankruptcy of the same court, within two years after it is passed, upon the written application of any creditor or creditors whose debts, amounting to not less than $250, would be barred thereby, upon due notice and hearing, and satisfactory evidence that such order was obtained by fraud or perjury, or that the bankrupt failed to surrender all his unexempt property, or influenced the action of any creditor in respect to said discharge or to a composition by any payment or promise contrary to law, and that such fraud, perjury, or illegal act was not known to said creditors in season to be availed of in opposition to such discharge.

NEW PROMISE.

SEC. 89. Every promise, covenant, undertaking, and security given by any bankrupt, whether before or after his discharge, to pay a provable debt or any part thereof, notwithstanding his discharge, shall be void, unless some new and valuable consideration is given therefor.

PARTNERS.

SEC. 90. When two or more persons residing and owing debts, as aforesaid, who are or have been partners in trade, become insolvent before the final settlement of their joint affairs, they, or any two or more of them, may be jointly adjudged bankrupt upon the petition of said partners, or any of them, due notice being first given to such as do not join in the petition; and upon evidence that any of said respondents are not insolvent the petition shall, as to him or them, be dismissed. And such partners, or any two or more of them, who shall have committed acts of bankruptcy, may be jointly adjudged bankrupt, upon the petition of creditors and proceedings thereon as hereinbefore provided for individual debtors. Such petition, in either case, may be brought in any district where a petition by or against either of the partners might be brought; and the court shall have power to cause notice to be served on such as are without the district in such mode as it deems best; and the court in which the first petition is filed shall have exclusive jurisdiction of the case, unless the judge of said court shall decide that one of the other districts will be more advantageous and convenient for the parties interested, in which case the court of the latter district shall have the conduct of the proceedings. This rule shall apply to individual debtors proceeded against in more than one district as well as to partnerships.

SEC. 91. All the creditors of the firm, and the several creditors of each partner, may prove their respective debts. The assignee shall be chosen by the joint creditors, and all the joint and separate property shall vest in him upon his qualification. He shall keep separate accounts of the joint estate, and of the separate estate of each partner, and after deducting out of the whole amount received by the assignee the whole of the expenses and disbursements, the net proceeds of the joint stock shall be appropriated to pay the creditors of the copartnership, and the net proceeds of the separate estate of each partner shall be appropriated to pay his separate creditors. If there is any surplus of the separate estate of any partner, after the payment of his separate debts, with interest to the time of payment, such surplus shall be added to the joint stock for the payment of the joint creditors; and if there is any surplus of the joint stock after payment of the joint debts, with like interest, the same shall be appropriated to and divided among the separate estates of the several partners according to their respective right and interest therein, and shall be applied to the payment of their separate debts, respectively. The certificate of discharge shall be granted or refused to each partner as the same would or ought to be if the proceedings had been against him alone. In all other respects the proceedings by or against partners shall be conducted in the like manner as if they had been commenced and prosecuted by or against one person alone.

CORPORATIONS.

SEC. 92. The provisions of this title shall apply to all moneyed, business, or commercial corporations and joint-stock companies, and upon the petition of any officer of any such corporation or company, duly authorized by a vote of a majority of the corporators at any legal meeting called for the purpose, or upon the petition of any creditor of such corporation or company, made and presented to the court having jurisdiction and in the manner provided in respect to debtors, the like proceedings shall be had and taken as are provided in the case of debtors. All the provisions of this title which apply to the debtor, or set forth his duties in regard to furnishing schedules and inventories, executing papers, submitting to examinations, disclosing, making over, secreting, concealing, conveying, assigning, or paying away his money or property, shall in like manner, and with like force, effect, and penalties, apply to each and every officer of such corporation or company, in relation to the same matters concerning the corporation or company, and the money and property thereof. All payments, conveyances, and assignments declared fraudulent and void by this title when made by a debtor, shall in like manner, and to the like extent, and with like remedies, be fraudulent and void when made by a corporation or company. Whenever any corporation by proceedings under this title is declared bankrupt, all its property and assets shall be distributed to the creditors of such corporation in the manner provided in the title in respect to natural persons. But no allowance or discharge shall be granted to any corporation or joint-stock company, or to any person or officer or member thereof.

SEC. 93. Whenever a corporation created by the laws of any State, whose business is carried on wholly within the State creating the same, and also any insurance company so created, whether all its business shall be carried on in such State or not, has had proceedings duly commenced against such corporation or company before the courts of such State for the purpose of winding up the affairs of such corporation or company, and dividing its assets ratably among its creditors, and lawfully among those entitled thereto, prior to proceedings having been commenced against such corporation or company under the bankruptcy laws of the United States, any order made, or that shall be made by such court, agreeably to the State law, for the ratable distribution or payment of any dividend of assets to the creditors of such corporation or company, while such State court shall remain actually or constructively in possession or control of the assets of such corporation or company, shall be deemed valid, notwithstanding proceedings in bankruptcy may have been commenced and be pending against such corporation or company.

COMPOSITION.

SEC. 94. At any time after a debtor has been adjudged bankrupt, and has filed his schedule and inventory, he may file in the clerk's office of the court of bankruptcy a proposal for a composition with his creditors. Such proposal shall not be considered unless it provides for the payment in cash of all debts, costs, and charges entitled to priority by this act, and for a payment of at least 15 per cent. to the general creditors, of which, at least, one-third shall be cash, and the remainder shall be amply secured, by indorsement or otherwise, in a mode to be stated in said proposal.

SEC. 95. Upon the filing of such a proposal, the court shall order a hearing before the register upon the issue of the acceptance or rejection thereof, of which hearing the clerk shall send notice by mail, post-paid, to all known creditors of the debtor, at least ten days before the time appointed therefor, of the substance of the said proposal. Until said hearing, the assignee, or, if no assignee has been chosen, the register, or some person to be designated by the court, shall be the custodian of all the books of account and other writings and papers of the debtor which can be of use in deciding said issue, including copies of his schedule and inventory, and the same shall be open at all reasonable times to the examination of the creditors, and of any agent, accountant, attorney, or committee, duly acting for the creditors, or any of them.

SEC. 96. At the hearing, the debtor shall be personally present, and may be examined by any creditor, and by the register and assignee, concerning all matters pertinent to the issue.

All other pertinent evidence may be given; and the debtor may, at any time before the hearing is closed, offer a written modification of his proposal, more favorable to the creditors than that originally proposed; but not one which is, or can be, less favorable; and such modified proposal shall thenceforward be considered the proposal.

SEC. 97. After the evidence is closed, the hearing shall be adjourned for not less than two nor more than four weeks, and if at or before the adjourned hearing the debtor shall file with the register, or in the clerk's office, the written assent to said proposal, signed by at least one-third in number and three-fourths in value of all his known creditors, or their attorneys for such purpose specially authorized, the same shall be forthwith reported to the judge in the mode before provided in respect to hearings, together with the opinion of the register thereon. No assent shall be signed by any creditor before the first hearing, and any which has been so signed shall not be counted; nor shall any creditor having priority, or who has received a preference, be counted; nor a secured creditor, except for the excess of his debt, to be ascertained as the court may prescribe. Demands for unliquidated damages shall be assessed under the direction of the court before the acceptance of the proposal, but need not be counted unless assessed before the adjourned hearing. The judge shall appoint some convenient time, not more than thirty days after said report is filed, for a hearing of all parties interested, and shall confirm said proposal if the same appears to have been duly assented to, and is, in the opinion of the court, beneficial for the creditors, and not unjust to any one. If the only valid objection to said proposal is the insufficiency of the security for the deferred payments, the court may affirm it upon satisfactory security being given. Upon such acceptance, the money for the cash payments shall be forthwith paid into the registry of the court, with a list of the creditors, and of the amount due to each; and shall be paid out to said creditors as other moneys are paid out of the registry. And if there are deferred installments, evidence shall be furnished to the satisfaction of the court that the same have been all duly and properly secured, as provided in the order; and, thereupon, the court shall grant a discharge to the debtor, which shall release him from his provable debts, with the exceptions applicable to an ordinary discharge in bankruptcy, and with the further exception of payments upon said composition; and the debtor's property remaining undisposed of shall revert to him, ipso facto, upon the granting of the discharge, unless some special order shall be made to the contrary.

SEC. 98. If the payments are not made and securities given before the expiration of thirty days from the order of acceptance of the composition, the case shall proceed in bankruptcy; and in such case the assignee may recover all moneys which shall have been paid to any creditors and which should have been paid into court, or so much thereof as may be necessary to put all creditors upon a just and equal footing, by summary proceedings in the court of bankruptcy against the creditors, jointly, who have received such preference, or against such as can be found, and are able to respond; and for this purpose, creditors without the district may be served with notice or process, as the judge may direct.

SEC. 99. The court of bankruptcy shall have and retain jurisdiction over a compounding debtor to enforce the payment of the composition before or after the discharge, and over assignees; and other officers having any of his property in their possession or control; and the district and circuit courts shall have jurisdiction concurrently with the State courts of all suits against indorsers, sureties, or others bound for such payments, and upon the property so bound, in all matters pertaining to such composition.

CRIMES.

SEC. 100. From and after the passage of this act if any person who shall be adjudged bankrupt shall, after or within three months before his bankruptcy, and in contemplation or apprehension thereof, secrete, conceal, retain, or remove any of his property, or any book, deed, writing, or document relating thereto; or alter, mutilate, or falsify any such book, deed, writing, or document; or conceal from his assignee or omit from his inventory any property hereinbefore required to be stated therein, or make therein any willfully false valuation, or place any false debt upon his schedule with intent, in each of the above-mentioned cases, to defraud his assignee or his creditors in bankruptcy; or if he shall, in case of any person having to his knowledge proved a false or fictitious debt against his estate, fail to disclose the same to his assignee within one month after coming to the knowledge thereof; or shall make any payment, or give any advantage, or the promise of either, to any creditor, with intent to affect the proceedings in bankruptcy or composition; or shall attempt to account for any of his property by fictitious losses or expenses; or shall, within the period aforesaid, and in contemplation or apprehension aforesaid, obtain on credit from any person any money, goods, chattels, or other thing of value, with intent not to pay for the same according to his undertaking; or with intent, by the means thus acquired, to prefer a creditor or commit any fraud on this act, or to increase his assets in bankruptcy, or to affect the proceedings therein; or shall pledge, pawn, or dispose of otherwise than in the due course of his trade any goods or chattels which he shall have obtained on credit and which remain unpaid for at the time of his bankruptcy, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment, with or without hard labor, for a period not exceeding three years.

SEC. 101. Any person who shall knowingly and fraudulently present any false or fictitious or substantially exaggerated debt or claim for proof against the estate of a bankrupt, or use such false, fictitious, or exaggerated claim in composition, whether personally or by an agent, proxy, or attorney; any agent, proxy, or attorney who shall knowingly offer or use the same; any creditor of a bankrupt who shall knowingly receive any money or thing of value, or the promise of any, as a consideration for any act or forbearance to act in respect to the choice of an assignee, or the acceptance of a composition, or the discharge of a bankrupt, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $2,000, or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both.

SEC. 102. Any person who shall knowingly and corruptly make any false oath in, or in relation to, any proceedings in bankruptcy, shall be deemed to have committed perjury.

SEC. 103. If an assignee shall fraudulently and corruptly either embezzle, appropriate to his own use, spend or transfer any of the assets in his charge to the injury of the creditors, he shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than two years, or both.

SEC. 104. This act shall take effect as to the appointment of registers and supervisors and the promulgation of rules upon its passage, and shall go into full operation on the — day of —, and no officer shall be deemed to have earned any salary excepting from and after said last-mentioned day.

LOCATING PUBLIC LANDS IN THE STATE OF IOWA.

Mr. DEERING. I ask by unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa relating to the location of lands by certain counties, upon which subject a bill has been already introduced by me and now pending before the Committee on the Public Lands.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution and memorial relative to locating land by the several counties of this State.

Whereas there is a large amount of land due the several counties of this State from the United States in lieu of swamp lands sold by the General Government; and

Whereas there are no United States lands in the State of Iowa upon which the counties of this State can locate the land scrip due them from the General Government: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and are respectfully, requested and urged to use all lawful means to procure the passage of an act by the Congress of the United States authorizing the location of the land scrip due the several counties of this State upon any Government lands open to public entry in any other State or Territory of the United States.

LORE ALFORD,
Speaker of the House.
FRANK T. CAMPBELL,
President of the Senate.

Approved March 17, 1880.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original joint resolution on file in this office.

JAS. HULL,
Secretary of State of the State of Iowa.

FORT RIPLEY RESERVATION.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table at this time the bill (H. R. No. 1153) to restore to the public domain a part of the military reservation known as the Fort Ripley reservation, in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes, in order to concur in the Senate amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. That is a motion to go to business on the Speaker's table, and will require unanimous consent. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1 strike out all after "except," in line 4, down to and including the word "and," where it occurs the second time in line 11.

Also on page 1, line 22, to strike out the words "that part of."

Also on page 2, at the end of line 12, to insert:

"And provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall, prior to offering any quarter section, half quarter section, or quarter quarter section whereon are situate any public buildings or improvements, erected or made by the Government, cause the said tracts with the improvements thereon to be appraised by three disinterested persons, and upon his approval of such appraisal shall dispose of said tracts at not less than the appraised value."

Mr. WASHBURN. I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the title as amended by the Senate will be concurred in.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act to restore to the public domain the military reservation known as the Fort Ripley reservation, in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports, in order that the House may proceed to the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. Before putting that motion the Chair, if there be no objection, will recognize several gentlemen for requests they desire to make.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Very well.

HENRY J. CHURCHMAN.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 475) granting a pension to Henry J. Churchman was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HEIRS OF PETER GRUBB.

On motion of Mr. FINLEY, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Pensions were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the heirs of Peter Grubb, who furnished supplies for the United States during the revolutionary war, and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

KIMBERLY BROTHERS.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am instructed by the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department to report back to the House for present consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3290) for the relief of Kimberly Brothers. I desire to put this bill on its immediate passage. I hope no gentleman will object. It is a matter of very great importance, almost a matter of life and death to the complainants.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is that a private bill?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to its present consideration.

MOBILE BAY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following communication from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 17, 1880.

Ordered, That the letter of the Secretary of War in reference to Mobile Bay be transmitted to the House of Representatives for its consideration.

The communication and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF MOBILE HARBOR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 19, 1880.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in connection with the report of Captain A. N. Damrell, Corps of Engineers, on survey of the harbor at Mobile, Alabama, transmitted on the 13th instant, a communication of the Chief of Engineers, covering copy of a report with accompanying map from the board of engineers for river and harbor improvements to which the report of Captain Damrell was referred for consideration.

Ordered, That it be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

The communication and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EXAMINATION OF NOXUBEE RIVER, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 18, 1880.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to communicate to the House of Representatives, for its consideration, the letter of the Secretary of War and of the Chief of Engineers in reference to examinations of the Noxubee River, Mississippi, and the Choctawhatchee River, Alabama.

The communication and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

JACQUES CLAMORGAN AND PETER PROVENCHER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following communication from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 6, 1880.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to transmit to the Senate for examination in reference to the claims therein mentioned, now pending before the Senate, certain letters from the Secretary of the Interior addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and by him submitted to the House on the 13th day of May, 1874, and described in the House Journal of that date as "letters in relation to private land claims of Jacques Clamorgan and Peter Provencher."

The SPEAKER. These requests of the Senate have been usually granted. If there be no objection this request will be granted.

Mr. CONGER. If a committee of the House is examining the question, the papers should not, perhaps, be taken from them till they report them back.

The SPEAKER. The Chair caused this resolution to be placed in the hands of the chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, who returned the answer he did not know of any objection to granting the request of the Senate. However, it might as well go to that committee, so that they may act on the subject. The Chair therefore would prefer that the communication should be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The communication was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PACIFIC MAIL STEAMSHIP CONTRACT.

Mr. MANNING. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] yields to me that I may present the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk, to inquire into an alleged contract between the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railway Companies and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. I submitted this resolution formerly, but it was objected to. The objections made heretofore have now been withdrawn.

The preamble and resolution were read, as follows:

Whereas it has been announced in the public press that a contract has been entered into by and between the Central Pacific Railroad Company and the Union Pacific Railroad Company on the one part, and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company on the other part, by the terms of which contract the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in consideration of receiving $1,330,000 annually for five years from the railway companies, binds itself to accept and charge such rates for freight and passengers as may be fixed by the railroad companies, and to collect the same from the commercial public; and

Whereas the effect of such a contract is directly prejudicial to the public interest and contrary to the public policy that controlled Congress in chartering the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and in granting to both railway companies large subsidies in money and lands: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Railroads be directed to inquire, specifically, whether such a contract exists, and to do so shall have power to send for persons and papers, and shall report what legislation is necessary to protect the public interests in the premises; and such committee may sit in vacation and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CONGER. Let that go to a committee to be reported upon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to the resolution going to a committee to be reported on.

Mr. MANNING. What I desire is that the committee shall be instructed to inquire into this alleged contract.

Mr. CONGER. Let the Committee on Pacific Railroads report such action as is necessary on this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this resolution belongs to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MANNING. I thought that was the proper reference. It was objected to, however, by gentlemen belonging to the Committee on Pacific Railroads. And rather than permit such an iniquitous proceeding as this not to be investigated I agreed the matter should go to that committee.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] objects to the consideration of the resolution at this time, but does not object to its reference.

Mr. MANNING. I do not understand how it can be referred. I ask by the resolution that the committee to which it is proposed to refer it shall be authorized to investigate certain alleged facts.

The SPEAKER. The committee can report back the resolution and recommend its adoption by the House.

Mr. MANNING. It does seem to me that gentlemen on the other side should not object to this resolution, which proposes an investigation into a transaction which is not only against public policy but is also criminal in its character because it is a conspiracy. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] wants to object to an investigation of this kind, let him do so.

Mr. CONGER. I do not object to it; but I want a committee to examine the subject and to report that such an investigation is necessary.

Mr. MANNING. This is the third time the resolution has been introduced and each time objected to, and the objection afterward withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan objects to the consideration of the resolution in the House until the Committee on Pacific Railroads shall have first considered the subject and asked for its adoption.

Mr. MANNING. That is precisely what the resolution calls for; that the Committee on Pacific Railroads shall investigate and report to this House what shall be done.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be referred to the committee.

Mr. MANNING. I suppose that is one way of killing the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman consent to its reference?

Mr. MANNING. Yes; I will take any course which may secure the investigation of the merits of the case.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

KIMBERLY BROTHERS.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] withdraws his objection made some time since to my reporting a bill from the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no objection to its being referred to the Calendar.

The bill (H. R. No. 3290) for the relief of Kimberly Brothers was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ATHERTON. I was not in my seat the other day when the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was called. I now ask consent to report from that committee two bills relating to public buildings so that they may go on the Calendar with the bills reported at that time relating to public buildings.

There was no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN ALTOONA.

Mr. ATHERTON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported, as a substitute for the bill H. R. No. 2035, a bill (H. R. No. 5331) to provide for the purchase of a suitable site and the erection of a public building in the city of Altoona, Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING IN SAINT JOSEPH, MISSOURI.

Mr. ATHERTON also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2665, a bill (H. R. No. 5332) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

INTERNATIONAL SHEEP AND WOOL SHOW.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 1229 be taken from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time. It is a small bill, but one of public interest, to which I think there will be no objection. It is a bill to authorize and direct the Commissioner of Agriculture to attend, in person or by deputy, at the international sheep and wool show to be held in the Centennial buildings, Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, in September, 1880, and to make a full and complete report of the same, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read.

The first section directs the Commissioner of Agriculture to attend, in person or by deputy, the international sheep and wool show to be held in the Centennial buildings, Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, in September, 1880, and to make a full and complete report of the same.

The second section provides that all sheep and wool which shall be imported for the sole purpose of exhibition at this international show shall be admitted without the payment of duty or customs fees or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, but all sheep and wool which shall be sold in the United States, or withdrawn for consumption therein at any time after such importation, shall be subject to the duties, if any, imposed on like imports by the revenue laws in force at the date of importation.

Mr. HOOKER. Ought not that bill to be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I desire to state that a bill identically the same in words as this bill has been unanimously reported to this House by the Committee on Agriculture and is now on the Calendar. I would also say that the exact phraseology of the second section of this bill has already passed this House on two different occasions, with the assent of the Committee on Ways and Means. I have consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] and with several other members of that committee, in regard to the second section of this bill, and they approve it. I therefore ask for its immediate consideration and passage. Time is a very essential element in this matter. The officials in charge desire to correspond with our consuls at foreign ports, and it is important that provision be immediately made for the admission, free of duty, of sheep and wool for this international show to be held at Philadelphia. The members of the Committee on Agriculture and the members of the Committee on Ways and Means are unanimously in favor of this bill, as I am informed. I therefore hope there will be no objection to it.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three several times, and passed.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WALLACE W. SCREWS.

Mr. SAMFORD, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Claims, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3749) for the relief of Wallace W. Screws, of Montgomery, Alabama; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL A. LOWE.

Mr. SAMFORD also, by unanimous consent, reported back from the same committee, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 937) for the relief of Samuel A. Lowe; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

COLUMBUS, GEORGIA, A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. PERSONS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 5383) to constitute Columbus, in the State of Georgia, a port of delivery; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several members called for the regular order.

The question being put on the motion of Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, that the morning hour of to-day be dispensed with, there were—ayes 91, noes 54.

Mr. PRICE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, and Mr. THOMAS TURNER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 114, noes 45.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the morning hour was dispensed with.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 3035) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes, and moved that the same be referred, with the accompanying report, to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARFIELD. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

The motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill just reported.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. CONVERSE in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3035) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration is a copy of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill of last year, except in a few small items which I will presently explain. The reasons why we have made no material changes are these: In the first place gentlemen on this floor are continually making charges against the Appropriations Committee of a desire to monopolize the business of other committees and to exercise their functions. Hence when we have endeavored to reduce the salaries of some of our legations and to some extent reorganize and reform our diplomatic relations, it has been charged on the one hand that we were trenching upon the duties and privileges of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and upon the other that we were attempting to ingraft new legislation upon appropriation bills. To some extent the first charge is well founded, but it grew out of the fact that the committee on federal relations either did not agree with us as to the necessity of any changes or did not desire to enter upon the work of reform. Under this bill we have confined ourselves to appropriating what is necessary to conduct the system as it is with the hope that the said committee will find time and inclination to investigate our diplomatic and consular system and suggest the needed reforms.

The second charge of new legislation upon an appropriation bill is true, but after the long practice of all parties on this subject it is very late in the day to make such an objection. Not only this House—I mean the republican side of it—but the Senate, on both sides, have urged this objection vehemently to any change in the salaries of our diplomatic representatives, and although this House has on several occasions insisted upon certain reductions, yet the Senate has uniformly refused to concur in our action, and in the end this House has been compelled to recede. Not wishing again to be placed in this humiliating attitude, we have appropriated for the salaries after the old rate, awaiting the pleasure of the Committee on Foreign Relations to suggest and carry into effect such changes as to them shall seem proper.

As to the consular system, it is the opinion of your committee that it should be encouraged and enlarged rather than curtailed and crippled. Our country is now suffering from overproduction in agriculture and manufactures, and what we most need and should secure at any reasonable cost is a market for our surplus products. And while we have not been entirely inactive in relation to the extension of our commerce, other nations have been making vigorous efforts to control the markets of the world. We cannot remain listless and idle spectators of this progress and improvement in other countries and leave our own to lag behind. The last decade has marked great improvement in our foreign trade. A few years ago our imports largely exceeded our exports, showing a system of depletion and consequent exhaustion; but the last year showed a balance of trade in our favor of more than $250,000,000, and this year it is hoped it will be still larger.

Our consular system, which relates mainly to commerce and our material interests, ought to be fostered and encouraged. Upon an examination of the figures in the Fifth Auditor's report for 1879 it will be found that the system paid all its expenses for that year and in addition turned over to the United States Treasury $131,390.92, all of which of course is a tax upon commerce, and tends to delay and embarrass it. While this amount paid into the Treasury is an item of importance, yet it is believed if it were used and employed in extending and enlarging our commerce, it would pay tenfold that amount by giving new markets to our people for the disposal of the surplus fruits of their labor.

There is no reason why we should not compete successfully for the trade of all nations. It is true that our merchant marine, under the idiotic system of compelling our ship-owners to buy vessels at a ruinous rate from American builders, has almost disappeared from the ocean; but it is hoped this evil will soon be remedied, and again American bottoms will transport American products to all the markets of the world.

While therefore it is the opinion of at least a portion of your committee that a reduction in our diplomatic service might be advantageously made, yet they are equally well convinced that an extension of our consular system judiciously made would greatly improve and benefit our material interests.

I stated there were but few changes made in the bill, and I do not propose to dwell on them at any length. The first is an item of $20,000, not in the last appropriation bill, which has been set apart for the purpose of paying chargés d'affaires ad interim and secretaries of legation while acting in the capacity of ministers when vacancies occur or the ministers are absent from their posts. It has been the custom for many years to make this appropriation, but at the last session of Congress, although the House voted it, when the bill went to the Senate this item was stricken out and no appropriation was made for these officers.

This House has never willingly sanctioned a change of that kind. We have always believed that if these secretaries of legation are called upon to perform the duties of ministers they should be paid a reasonable compensation for their services. Our ministers are allowed two months' leave of absence from their posts during the year, and one month's absence is allowed for traveling from the United States to their posts or from them to their homes, during which time it becomes the duty of these secretaries of legation to perform all the functions of a minister. This system entails but a small loss upon the Government, as the secretary of legation gets but one-half the minister's salary while he is performing this duty. We thought it but right and just they should be paid for services thus rendered, and have provided, in accordance with the estimate of the Secretary of State, for their payment the sum of $20,000.

In the second place, at the solicitation of the Secretary of State, we have given five new clerks to consuls at different points, namely, at Calcutta, at Melbourne, at Beirut, at Fayal, and Naples, and at the same time we withheld a clerk from the consul at Ottawa; so that we have provided for clerkships for only four of these consulates, at a salary not exceeding $1,500 per annum, amounting in all to $6,000.

It is very important they should have these clerks as we believe. At Calcutta there is a consular court, and quite an amount of business done. Very recently an American, who had committed some offense, or was charged with some offense on board of a vessel outside of the jurisdiction of the provincial government, was arrested and taken before the court of the provincial government in Calcutta, and was there tried and convicted. It was deemed at the time a misstep on the part of the provincial government, and the end of it has been that the man was demanded by the American Government and brought home and is now in charge of the officers of our Government and will have to stand his trial before the proper tribunal.

At Melbourne we have given a clerk with a salary not to exceed $1,500. Melbourne is the capital of Australia, with a population of two hundred thousand, and the area of Australia is only one-sixth less than that of all Europe. We have considerable commercial relations with that country, and many of our people go there for the purpose of entering the gold diggings, and it is necessary there should be a clerk to our consul at that point, as his labors are onerous.

Then we come to Beirut, in Syria, on the eastern end of the Mediterranean Sea, which is a landing-place for visitors who wish to go to the Holy Land. A great many Americans land there. We have at present no extensive commerce with it, but hope in time to see it greatly improved. There is a consular court there for the protection of our citizens, and we have given a clerk to that consulate.

We have allowed a clerk at Fayal, in the Portuguese dominions, and one at Naples, neither of which is a great commercial point; but at Naples we have a great many American travelers. Nearly all the Americans going to Italy stop at Naples, and we often find complications springing up which make it necessary our citizens should be protected. So we have given the consul at Naples a clerk.

We have added to the contingent expenses of last year for all the consuls abroad $10,000. We appropriated $115,000 the past year. It was not sufficient, as has been demonstrated to us. The Secretary estimated for $140,000, but we deemed it unnecessary to give him that amount. We have added to the $115,000 of last year $10,000, making the amount $125,000 for the next fiscal year.

We have also added $10,000 to the sum appropriated last year for taking care of our seamen abroad. We have already spent $53,000 for this laudable purpose, which commends itself most strongly to our sense of justice. We gave $50,000 last year, which was insufficient, and we propose to give $60,000 this year. And while I am talking to you to-day, Mr. Chairman, there are two or three of our vessels closed in by the ice in the Arctic regions, and the proposition passed the Committee on Appropriations a few days ago setting apart funds that one of our revenue-cutters should be put in order and sent to rescue these seamen. Disasters to our shipping have been great the past year, and hence the necessity of a liberal appropriation. They are brave, hardy men, and go into the service for the purpose of extending our commerce and we believe wherever they can be found, whether shipwrecked by storm or frozen in by ice, their interests and their wants should be considered and they should be protected from suffering as far as can be done by this Government. The appropriation for this purpose has been increased from $50,000 to $60,000.

Again, the Secretary of State recommended that we appropriate $500 for inclosing the cemetery at Smyrna where some of our American citizens are buried. This cemetery seems to be turned out, no attention having been paid to it, and we deemed it right and reasonable to give this amount. These, then, are the amounts added to the appropriation bill of last year, aggregating the sum of $46,500.

I have thus given the points of difference between the bill of last year as it became a law and the present bill. While your committee have in this instance, as in all others, had an eye to strict economy, yet it has endeavored by a small increase of expenditure to improve our consular system, to protect our seamen abroad, and pay to our secretaries of legation a fair compensation for services while acting in the capacity of ministers.

It is hoped this bill will meet with favor from the House and that a protracted discussion will be avoided.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. How many new clerks of legations does this provide for?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Only four. Leaving out Ottawa, where we have dispensed with the clerk, we have given five but making really an increase of only four.

Mr. McMILLIN. Could they not be dispensed with?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I think not, sir. We examined the matter carefully, and think it very important to grant this additional force at the points named.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Chairman, a characteristic of our age is the disposition to question the value of existing systems and institutions. This tendency is a wholesome one, and it is productive only of good when it is restrained and tempered by an honest desire to preserve whatever in established institutions has real worth. The hatred of shams and of hurtful privilege has a grand mission in the world, and it does excellent work in the cause of the people when it does not flame so high as to destroy the good with the evil. The spirit of inquiry has overtaken the diplomatic service of civilized nations; and this, too, must be subjected to the test of utility. Is there any good reason for maintaining what are called diplomatic relations between different countries? May not this branch of the public service be wholly abolished? Or, if not this, may it not be immensely reduced? May not one minister abroad, at some central court, do all that is now done by a dozen? As special envoys in addition to the regular force are often appointed when grave international difficulties arise, are not these all that we need, and can we not in ordinary times dispense with diplomatic agents altogether? Cannot the foreign offices of different governments settle disputed questions by corresponding directly with each other? Do we need any better instrument of diplomacy than the telegraph? Is not the lightning, hastening from capital to capital over the ocean cable, the best envoy extraordinary? Will not electricity enable us to dispense with foreign ministers; or, at least, to get along with cheap ones? In a word, is not the whole diplomatic system of the world a worn-out contrivance to secure places of honor and profit for the few at the expense of the many? These are some of the questions which are asked, and they must be satisfactorily answered by those who would retain in its essential features the present method of conducting negotiations between governments.

I may say, at the outset, that the question in dispute is not whether particular ministers have been able and faithful, or otherwise, in the discharge of their duties. If Smith has been indolent at one capital, if Brown has been stupid at another, if Jones has traded in the honor of his country at a third, that only proves that the Government was unfortunate in the choice of its agents, and not that the service to which they were appointed is useless. The question is not whether these men were meritorious ministers, but did the office which they undertook to fill afford noble opportunities to do good work for their country and for mankind? If inefficient and unfaithful officers are to be taken as evidence that the department to which they belong is unnecessary and injurious and should be abolished, then no branch of this or any other government can be defended. But no one proposes to act upon this principle in any other direction than that of our diplomacy. There have been bad judges; but we do not propose to abolish the judiciary. There have been idle, useless, and unworthy members of Congress; but no one on that account ever suggests that the country could get along without the National Legislature. It is evident that the issue to be discussed is not what is the character of officers, but what is the nature of the service? Is the service in itself necessary and useful, or the opposite? The question is not even whether at all or most of our foreign legations remarkable or extraordinary events occur in the course of any particular year. It will be sufficient to show that there is always enough common and useful work to do, and that extraordinary events are at all times liable to occur at any legation. The prudent commander stations his picket-guards at every point around his lines during the night even though his experience may have been that danger has commonly approached upon only one point, and often not at all. Our foreign ministers are the sentinels of the Republic. It would be better to keep all these at their places even if much of the time they had no useful work to do—which, however, is not the case—rather than that in a single instance some great danger should steal in upon us unforwarned.

It will hardly be denied that there is in the nature of things a presumption in favor of diplomatic intercourse between nations. In general there are the same reasons for maintaining diplomatic relations between governments that there are for maintaining social relations between individuals. The man who takes pains to become acquainted with his neighbors, to receive and return their visits, to remove misunderstandings, and to live pleasantly with them will find his advantage in this when occasions arise—and they will arise—in which general good feeling is indispensable to him. On the other hand, the sullen and unsocial man is left to fight the battle of life alone, and will often find that battle too hard for him. It is evident that the same principle is in large degree applicable to nations. The sending a minister abroad and receiving one in return is in itself a social and friendly act. It removes suspicion; it allays prejudice; it puts nations in easy relations with each other; it prevents misunderstandings, and is both a cheaper and more thorough defense against hostile attack than fleets and armies, for it removes the very causes by which hostile attacks are produced.

Again, it is worth remarking that the practice of the civilized world is in favor of a system of diplomacy. The united testimony of all nations that have any considerable rank must be held to be worth something. At the present time there is no nation of respectable standing among the powers of the earth that will consent to remain unrepresented at the capital of any other important country. Indeed, there is no tendency whatever among the governments of the world to dispense with their representatives abroad. Is it supposable that all these countries misunderstand their own true interests? No one who has been a reader of history will have failed to observe the value of the mere presence in a foreign country of a minister of sense and right feeling in preventing injurious and irritating occurrences. The eminent Montague Bernard, professor of international law in the University of Oxford, who was a member of the Joint High Commission held a few years since in this city, says in a volume of published lectures:

How many misunderstandings have been prevented, how much of cordiality and mutual esteem has been kept up, how often the sharp edges of a correspondence have been softened and disagreeable communications robbed of their sting by the mere presence of a man of temper and judgment who has been careful to live on a friendly footing with the ministers with whom he has to deal—of a man, in short, not unfit for his place.

It has been often noticed that in the absence of a minister there is less restraint upon those who, for any reason, are unfavorably disposed toward his country. When a foreign minister is present a certain respectful kindness is felt toward him as one who in his single person represents perhaps a great people and has come confidently to claim the hospitality of strangers. There is something in his very position which challenges gentleness and forbearance. In his presence the orators and the presses moderate their appeals to passion and prejudice against the government from which he is accredited. When he comes men lower their voices, suspend or qualify criticism, and put on hospitable looks as they do for a guest at their firesides. When two nations both need the favor of a third for commercial, political, or other purposes, the one which for any reason happens to be unrepresented has often in consequence been put to great disadvantage.

We have a notable example of this in our own recent history. At the outbreak of the late civil war, the British Queen's proclamation of neutrality, which furnished the text for all the subsequent diplomatic differences between England and America, was published on the 13th of May, 1861. Our minister, Mr. Adams, with full instructions from his Government how to avert this and other unfavorable action, arrived in London on the 15th of the same month. That proclamation, which was the source of so many of our woes, was issued two days before his arrival, although he was expected and arrangements had already been made at the foreign office for his reception. What reason can be given for this haste? After a delay of so many weeks from the commencement of hostilities in this country, there would seem to have been no difficulty in a delay of forty-eight hours longer. The real explanation undoubtedly is that Lord John Russell found it more convenient and comfortable to issue the proclamation before the arrival of the American minister. Had he been in London he would have asked for delay, for an opportunity to be heard and to make known the views of his Government, and ordinary diplomatic courtesy would have demanded that his request should be granted. He would have brought to the foreign office his earnest and convincing logic, fortified by principle and precedent, and Lord Russell would have been subjected to the embarrassment of hearing and answering his arguments before he should act. The British minister was not wholly uncommitted. The commissioners of the Confederate States had already gained his ear. As early as the 4th of May those commissioners, Messrs. Yancey, Mann, and Rost, had been received by Lord Russell in a way which he chose to designate as unofficial, and had made their argument ably and skillfully. That they had made a strong impression upon his mind is evident from a letter which he wrote soon after to Lord Lyons, then in Washington, in which he says that one of the points which they made was the difference between the North and the South as to a protective tariff. They stated that the United States Government had already imposed duties which would exclude British manufactures, whereas the southern people, being almost wholly agricultural, should their independence be recognized and achieved, would open their ports to free trade with England. One may pardon a British minister for finding such an argument interesting and convincing. When Mr. Adams arrived he had to contend, first of all, with this strong bias in the mind of the minister with whom his correspondence must be conducted. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that the painful disadvantage which our Government so long labored under in its relations with England grew principally out of the fact that Messrs. Yancey, Mann, and Rost were eleven days ahead of Mr. Adams in getting a hearing. No one can be blamed for what occurred in that time of anxious uncertainty, but it is easy now to see that Mr. Adams should have been in London by the first or middle of April. Had that been so, the Queen's proclamation would probably never have been issued.

Another instance of the disadvantage to which we have been put for the want of representation is of great interest to the country at the present moment. I think it was some time in the year 1876 that we decided to dispense with the United States mission to the Republic of Colombia. We did this from motives of economy and because we thought it unnecessary to keep up diplomatic intercourse with a nation of such inferior rank. For most of the time in the years 1877 and 1878 we had no minister in that country. During the year 1878, on the earnest representation of New York merchants that the business interests of our people in Colombia are too important to be left without the protection of a minister, we again appropriated the money to send one there, and he was subsequently sent. But in the mean time some things had happened in that country which we had had no share in, and which are now attracting general attention. It is a suggestive fact that the period during which we chose to vacate our representation in Colombia almost exactly coincides with the period of greatest French activity in preparation for the construction of an interoceanic canal. During that time Lieutenants Wyse and Reclus, distinguished officers of the French navy, completed their surveys of the route between Panama and the Gulf of Limon. On the 20th of March, 1878, the concession of the Colombian government to Lieutenant Wyse was signed by President Parra. Our new minister did not reach Bogota until early in the following September, nearly six months after this important contract was consummated.

The concession which was granted is the one which was afterward sold to that eminent French citizen whom we all delight to honor, M. de Lesseps. It is now generally held that this concession, which is in its terms an exclusive monopoly, may become the basis for an interoceanic canal company organized and established under French laws, and as such entitled to the protection of the French government. As an immense carrying-trade between our Atlantic and our Pacific coasts would naturally pass through such a canal when constructed, the American people are now discussing the question whether they can consent to permit even any risk of subjecting interests which can only be computed by hundreds of millions to the varying policy, the views of self-interest, the changes of ministry, or possibly the revolutions of a foreign government. We are now waking up and asking, When did all this happen? how did our French neighbors gain this advantage? who has blundered? what are we to do about the matter? I do not attempt to discuss the question how important this issue may be to us. I only say that if it is dangerous to our interests that a company should be formed under the laws of France to construct an interoceanic canal across the Isthmus, and if it was a mistake to allow the preparatory steps to be taken for the organization of such a company, then it was also a mistake not to have kept constantly at Bogota a capable and well-informed minister who could have asserted our right to be heard, and who could have protested against any measures unfavorable to our interests at a time when the protest would have been less likely to produce bad feeling than it now will, after the enterprise has made such progress.

This mistake of going unrepresented in Colombia was the less excusable because years since we had made one almost exactly like it with a result which should have prevented its repetition. More than thirty years ago our Government thought Nicaragua of so little importance that it sent no minister to that country, although Great Britain was always, and actively, represented there. What was the result? Some of us can remember how, in 1848, the people of our commercial cities were startled by receiving the news that England had taken possession of the town of San Juan and was extending its protectorate over the whole Mosquito coast. As San Juan was at the Atlantic terminus of the proposed canal through Nicaragua, the people of the United States were not pleased with this act of Great Britain. A diplomatic quarrel followed, which did not cease until the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was ratified, some time after which the Mosquito coast was restored to the protection of Nicaragua.

In our time, when so large a part of the world travels and intercommunication between nations is so general, events are constantly occurring in all commercial countries, whether great or small, which render the presence of a minister necessary for the protection of the property, the liberty, and even the life of his countrymen. In the multiplicity and hurry of business in our modern life, there is often hasty action in cases affecting personal rights by the authorities of commercial ports and by the inferior magistrates and judges or even higher officials of government. Hence we not unfrequently hear of the hasty seizure of a ship, the unlawful confiscation of a cargo, the arrest of citizens on insufficient grounds, the drafting of naturalized citizens of one country into the army of their native country, or the shipping of paupers and criminals from one country to another to be relieved of their presence. Cases like these cannot be inquired into and settled by the authorities of a country thousands of miles distant. They are cases which will not admit of delay. Before remonstrance can come from a remote government, either no remonstrance will be needed or an irreparable wrong will be done. Questions like these which are now constantly arising, and will arise more and more frequently as the intercourse of business is multiplied and extended, demand the constant presence and active attention of a diplomatic representative; and a minister abroad is as much needed to secure right conduct from his own countrymen as to furnish them protection. Citizens who travel often need to be reminded of their duty, as well as to receive sympathy and assistance. They do not always treat with proper respect the laws, regulations, and usages of other countries. In such cases a good minister will be just and impartial. He will demand that his countrymen abroad shall perform their duties as well as enjoy their rights. In this way he commands respect in the country where he resides as well as in the country from which he comes; and by discouraging unlawful conduct and unreasonable expectations in the citizens of both, removes those causes of irritation which often result so disastrously.

The fact that at the present day there are international questions arising in most countries, which make the presence of a minister indispensable, is well illustrated in the experience of our own diplomatic corps. We have examples of this in Switzerland, one of the smallest, and in Great Britain, one of the most powerful of the countries of the world, in both of which our representatives have found it necessary to guard against the unwarranted shipping of paupers to our shores and in both of which questions of citizenship have often required attention.

We have another example in the laborious and delicate service rendered by our ministers in Berlin. In one or two instances I have seen intimations in the press that the legation at that capital had nothing to do. Such a view of the case can spring only from a want of proper information. Of the thousands of Germans who come to this country and in good faith become naturalized citizens, intending to make America their home and the home of their posterity, many subsequently return to the Fatherland to visit relatives or to look after their property interests. Some of these find it necessary to remain a considerable time. The laws of Germany are very severe in regard to military service and its authorities are very jealous of attempts to evade it. Hence, under these laws and under our treaties with Germany, questions constantly arise, which the inferior authorities sometimes decide adversely to the citizen. The liability to this is increased by the fact that some Germans who have been naturalized in this country left Germany to avoid military service, or were even deserters from it. There are even some cases of those who have attempted to evade this service by the use of fraudulent papers of naturalization. All this begets suspicion on the part of magistrates and a disposition to apply the most rigorous rules of evidence.

Thus it happens that many Germans claiming to be citizens of the United States are, sometimes justly and sometimes unjustly, condemned to the military service or fined for having previously failed to perform it. Hundreds of these persons apply to the American minister for assistance, and ask him to intercede with the minister of foreign affairs for their relief. Our diplomatic correspondence shows that almost daily applications of this kind are made to the American legation in Berlin, either in writing or by personal visit. The labor thus thrown upon our representative and his assistants is constant and immense. He must investigate every one of these cases thoroughly, for the most important interests depend upon the judgment which he may form. He must take the greatest care to furnish protection to all genuine American citizens, and he must be equally careful not to take measures to absolve those who are not such citizens from their proper obligations to their government. When there is satisfactory evidence that the applicant has been unjustly treated, the minister must apply to the Government to have him relieved. This good work has been constantly going on for years past, and great numbers of American citizens have thus been protected in their newly acquired rights. That the requests of our representatives for the relief of their fellow-citizens have almost always been granted is alike creditable to their conscientious thoroughness in investigation and to the candor and fairness of the German government. Mr. George Bancroft, Mr. Bancroft Davis, and Mr. Bayard Taylor during his too short term of service, had, each of them, a large amount of this patriotic labor to perform in behalf of their fellow-citizens. Mr. Davis mentions thirty-five cases in one dispatch and eighty-six cases in another which he deemed of special interest and which did not include the ordinary callers at the legation for advice and assistance. It is evident that a day should never be allowed to pass at the American legation in Berlin without some person being present authorized and qualified to investigate cases of this kind.

Another chapter of our diplomatic history, which shows how indispensable a minister may be, is found in the services of Mr. Washburne in Paris during the Franco-German war and the rule of the Commune. During this period of danger and alarm, he had first of all to protect all American citizens, whether native or naturalized, in person and property. This he successfully accomplished. Next, the government of North Germany, together with several smaller states, requested him to take in charge thirty thousand German citizens, who had been left in Paris when that city was declared to be in a state of siege. With the approval of his own government, he accepted the responsible trust. On the 28th of August, 1870, an order was issued by the governor of Paris expelling this multitude of helpless citizens from France. Their distress was unspeakable. A large portion of them were destitute, and although there were able-bodied men among them, the women and the children, the invalids and the aged constituted the large majority. Mr. Washburne had to provide a safe conduct for all these beyond the French lines; he had to seek out the destitute, and relieve their wants; and he had to protect all against the suspicion and the rage of excited Frenchmen. As soon as it was known that the interests of German citizens were in his care, they came in crowds to his legation. On one occasion more than five hundred had gathered at his door before seven o'clock in the morning, and in some days there were not less than twenty-five hundred or three thousand persons in waiting. Many Germans, without cause and on mere suspicion, were arrested and thrown into prison. These he visited, inquired into the facts, and secured their release. During this period, he worked every day from twelve to eighteen hours, and remained at the railroad depot until midnight to superintend the departure of the Germans, and to provide for cases of destitution that had been overlooked. So successful was he in the performance of these responsible and burdensome duties that he was able to say at the close that there had been very little loss of life or property on the part of either German or American citizens. He did a noble work for his country and for mankind. He has thrown the light of his courage and philanthropy over the dry routine of the diplomatic service. Most appropriately, both Secretary Fish and Count Bismarck, each in behalf of his own country, thanked him in words of heartiest approval.

Instances are not infrequent where a diplomatic representative has by prompt and judicious personal effort, at some moment of sudden irritation, saved his country from a foolish, expensive, and murderous war, or from grave complications threatening war. One such service as this to a nation more than repays all the expense of its representation abroad for a century. Facts are what are wanted in illustration of this, and I cite two or three from the history of our own country. The first which I shall mention fell in large part under my own observation. On the 7th of October, 1864, the United States war steamer Wachusett and the confederate steamer Florida lay peacefully together in the harbor of Bahia. The following night Captain Collins, of the Wachusett, steamed alongside of the Florida, when her officers and crew were mostly ashore, towed her out to sea, and conveyed her to our own coast. This was no doubt one of the grossest violations of the rights of a friendly neutral power of which we have any account. It was between nations what it would be between individuals if a man should pursue his enemy into the house of a friend and attack him there. The people of Bahia were, of course, greatly excited; cannon from the forts, though without effect, opened fire upon the retreating disturber of the peace. An angry mob filled the streets. They attacked the United States consulate and dishonored its coat of arms. There was wild talk of reprisals, of seizing American cargoes, and burning American ships. The news of the outrage reached Rio de Janeiro, the capital of the country, on the night of the 13th. The next morning scenes of angry excitement occurred in that city similar to those in Bahia, except that there was no hostile demonstration against the consulate. A cabinet council was called early in the morning, which had been together but a short time when the conclusion was already reached to send to the minister of the United States his passports, accompanied by a letter of indignant remonstrance demanding immediate reparation. At this crisis the energetic and patriotic American minister, General Webb, did just what was needed to extricate his country from a very awkward situation.

Having heard some rumor of the cabinet council, he went in pursuit of it, and having found it, with friendly abruptness broke into the circle of angry ministers just in time to prevent hostile action. He frankly told them that what had occurred at Bahia was an outrage; that our Government would promptly disapprove it; that those engaged in it would be punished; that an ample apology would be made by the United States to the insulted sovereignty of Brazil, and that a man-of-war would be sent to the harbor of Bahia to salute the Brazilian flag. This commendable course had the desired effect, and an amicable adjustment of difficulties was soon effected. By this single act General Webb paid for his own salary and the salaries of all his predecessors in Brazil. It is not pleasant to reflect upon what might have happened if we had had no minister in that country. For want of a tranquilizing assurance that ample and speedy reparation would be made, the popular indignation might have gone so far that American shipping or other property might have been injured. Then the pride of our own people would, in turn, have been wounded, and differences would have arisen which it might not have been easy to arrange. No doubt the United States is a much stronger country than Brazil, but at that time we had by no means brought our civil war to a conclusion, and Brazil, though not a first-class power, has a sovereign of character and ability; has large resources, and a considerable degree of spirit and discipline. Such an enemy at such a time might have proved to be no small addition to our embarrassments.

The next case of this kind of which I will speak occurred in Japan, and threatened to involve us in hostilities with China. In 1874 the Japanese government fitted out a naval expedition against Formosa, a dependency of the Chinese Empire. The American steamer New York, belonging to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and several prominent American citizens, were then in the service of the Japanese government. It was arranged that this force should be a part of the expedition. Our minister to Japan, Mr. Bingham, whose eloquent voice some of us have often heard upon this floor, addressed to the government of Japan a note of earnest remonstrance against such use of an American vessel and American citizens against a power with which the United States was at peace, and asked that they should be detached from the expedition. This request was complied with, and we were thus saved from a serious disturbance of our friendly relations with China. It may be said that China is a nation which we should have no reason to fear; but the commerce of our country with China is very great, and it could not be interrupted without injury to the general prosperity.

One more instance of the great usefulness of the regular diplomatic service in averting the interruption of friendly relations is furnished in the negotiations between this country and Great Britain in regard to what were known as the "Alabama claims." It has been said that as here was a question of the first magnitude it had to be settled by special commissioners, and not by ordinary diplomatic representatives. Now, I take pleasure in admitting that the special members of the Joint High Commission rendered invaluable service to both countries; but there is also abundant evidence, in the first place, that the treaty of Washington never could have been adopted without the services of Sir Edward Thornton, the British minister to this country; and in the second place, that it could never have been carried out but for the services of General Schenck, the American minister in London. Of course General Schenck and Sir Edward Thornton were themselves members of the Joint High Commission and had their full share in the labors of all its sessions. As to the special usefulness of Sir Edward Thornton in securing the adoption of the treaty, it has now come to be generally understood that Earl Grey and the other English members of the commission relied fully upon him in forming their opinions as to what the temper of the American people would bear and what the American Government would accept. He had been several years in this country; he had carefully studied the questions in debate; he had often exchanged views with our President and Ministers of State; and he had read our newspapers and become acquainted with our people. It was a plain dictate of common sense, and none knew it better than Lord Grey and his associates, that such a man would better understand what was acceptable to Americans than any special commissioner who had just set foot upon our soil. Sir H. L. Bulwer states in his testimony before a parliamentary commission that the reason why Earl Derby and Lord Clarendon failed in the earlier attempts to settle the difficulties with the United States was that they undertook to make treaties without availing themselves of the knowledge of our country acquired by the British minister in Washington; and hence they were always proposing something which our Government would not entertain.

But Lord Granville was now the minister for foreign affairs, and he had made up his mind not to repeat the mistakes of his predecessors. Hence the special commissioners came to Washington under an inspiration which led them to assign a prominent part to their envoy here in the negotiation of the new treaty. Not less important were the services afterward rendered by our minister in England, General Schenck, in saving the treaty from being repudiated by the British cabinet. On the 15th of December, 1871, the "Alabama case," which had been prepared by Mr. Bancroft Davis, and which contained an argument in favor of what were known as the "indirect claims," was laid before the tribunal, which then first assembled at Geneva. About a month later great dissatisfaction began to be expressed in England, accompanied by heated discussions in the press and in Parliament that the "indirect claims" had been included in the American case. On the 3d of February, 1872, the British ministry officially announced that they had not expected that the "indirect claims" would be presented at Geneva, and that they could not consent to have those claims considered. The irritation between the two countries growing out of this difference of opinion as to the scope of the treaty continued to increase until the early part of May. At the close of a conference of several hours on the evening of the 9th of May Lord Granville said to General Schenck as they parted that, while he did not wish to utter anything like a menace, he did not think that the chances for an agreement between the two countries were favorable. General Schenck replied that he was of the same opinion. That night, General Schenck tells us, he could not sleep. He was pained beyond measure that the only fruit of so much negotiation should be failure, accompanied by increased bitterness and hostility.

The next morning he resolved to make one effort more. He commenced writing a rapid but clear and vigorous restatement of the position of our Government in regard to the "indirect claims." Learning that a cabinet meeting was in progress he resolved not to wait its conclusion, but called upon Lord Granville at the foreign office and delivered to him so much of the paper he was preparing as had been copied and afterward furnished him with the rest. It was this statement of our minister, presented by him in person with an earnest expression of his desire to save the treaty—a desire which Lord Granville fully shared with him—that induced the British cabinet to postpone unfavorable action and to continue their representation at Geneva. It was a moment when the right word heartily spoken saves nations from years of calamity. Early in June General Schenck delivered to Mr. Adams, then on his way to Geneva, a memorandum in regard to the "indirect claims," which was made the basis for the settlement of that troublesome question in the tribunal. On the 15th of June, 1872, the tribunal reassembled at Geneva, and on the 27th of that month all serious difficulties between the two countries were removed by the decision of the tribunal that the "indirect claims" should be wholly excluded from its consideration. Thus through the judicious and unremitting effort of our regular representative to England the treaty of Washington was saved, an event for which not only England and America but all mankind have reason to be thankful.

I must not close these remarks without briefly calling the attention of the House to one great body of information which we have in the Government libraries upon the general question I have discussed—the usefulness of the diplomatic service. I refer to the numerous and voluminous reports upon this subject from committees of the British Commons. I am far from accepting the authority of even the greatest British statesmen upon all points. As an American I should expect their opinions upon many questions to be molded by a strong bias in favor of the institutions and usages to which they are accustomed. But upon one question they are excellent authority; they do understand what will contribute to the material greatness and prosperity of England. That they understand that, the wonderful history of their country is the best evidence. They make that a study, and are constantly testing all branches of their public service by that standard. This inquiry into the usefulness of the diplomatic service and the possible methods of improving it was not first raised by us. It has been vigorously prosecuted in England for nearly half a century. Successive committees of the House of Commons have been appointed to investigate this subject, take testimony, and make report. Before these committees have testified all those who by ability and long service were best qualified to furnish information. The most experienced diplomatic representatives of Great Britain, the ministers of foreign affairs, the under secretaries, and their subordinates of the foreign office have all brought their contributions of knowledge to the investigations of these committees. This laborious and discriminating accumulation of the results of enlightened experience must go for something with us, must be worthy of our study. I have been at the pains to examine with care nearly two thousand pages of these reports upon the diplomatic service, as they are found in the English Blue Book. I have endeavored to ascertain what conclusions that might be instructive to us are fairly established by these investigations. Omitting such as are of less importance or are left doubtful, I mention a few which are pertinent to our inquiries in this country.

In the first place, we have in these volumes the concurrent testimony of a large number of the best men of England to the great value of the diplomatic service as a means of preserving peace. Many illustrations of this are given which time will not permit me to quote. Indeed, the truth of this proposition is assumed in a large portion of the evidence as being well established. The Earl of Malmsbury declares that the great object of the diplomatic profession is the maintenance of peace, and that if it does not accomplish this it is substantially useless.

Again, there is a general agreement among witnesses in these volumes as to the advantage of the diplomatic service to commerce. Sir Rutherford Alcock, who was so long British envoy in China, attributes the enormous development of British trade in that country to the combined influence of the diplomatic and consular services. From passages containing opinions similar to this in regard to other countries I quote one at length because it treats of an incidental point of some interest to us—the question how far the importance of a foreign mission in any country is to be measured by the amount of trade with it. The passage is contained in the testimony of Hon. Edward Hammond, for many years permanent under secretary of state. The chairman of the committee questions him as follows:

I gather from your remarks that there is a very large amount of attention paid to commercial interests in our foreign missions, and I should like to ask you whether you do not think that the relative importance of foreign missions may be fairly measured by the extent of the trade existing with this country?

To this question Mr. Hammond replies:

No; I cannot agree with that necessarily. There may be a small amount of trade with a foreign country, but political questions may arise in that foreign country which, though they would not interfere with the commercial interests of the country as regards that foreign country, might, if insufficiently known, have a very important and prejudicial bearing upon the commerce of this country generally. That is the purport of the answer which I gave the other day. What I mean to say is this, that nothing can happen in Europe which disturbs the peace of Europe without more or less interfering with the industry of this country; and I have illustrated that by reminding you that the civil war in America paralyzed entirely a very large and important industry of this country; and, in fact, all the commercial interests in the country are still more or less suffering from the effects of that civil war, and yet we had nothing to do with it.

I remark, in the next place, that I find no trace in these reports to the House of Commons of any tendency to substitute direct correspondence between two countries for diplomatic representation. There is not the slightest intimation that foreign missions can be dispensed with or reduced in number or quality. On the contrary, there is a great weight of testimony in favor of relying upon the local knowledge and increasing the responsibility of ministers abroad. On this point I quote the interesting statement of one of the most accomplished diplomatists of England, Sir H. L. Bulwer, to whose opinion I have already referred. He says:

In my view we have got into very grave difficulties by not making our ministers of late years sufficiently responsible; and if you like I will give you two or three instances. Take the American affairs. When Lord Derby came into office he was certainly desirous, if possible, to reconcile the two countries. What would a sensible man, unfettered by bad advice, have done in that case? Why, supposing that it had been Lord Palmerston, he would have written to the head of the mission at Washington and he would have said, "Well, I want to make up these matters with the United States, if I can, but I do not choose to make any proposition that will not be accepted; go and have a talk with the minister for foreign affairs there, and see what it is that would be accepted, and give me your opinion." Well, I venture to say, knowing something of that country and its people, that I could have gone to the minister of foreign affairs at Washington, and have come away with a perfectly clear idea in my own mind as to the sort of proposition that would succeed, and the sort of proposition that would not; and therefore the responsibility would have been thrown on me as to the course that the government at home could adopt; but it would have been giving a great deal of power to me, as minister, and showing a great reliance on the minister at Washington. Instead of doing that, Lord Derby, apparently without consulting our representative in the United States, makes a proposition of his own, which, directly it gets to the United States, is refused, and it was certain to be refused, because he said our government will give this, and will not give that; and anybody who knows anything of negotiation knows that directly you say what you will not give, that becomes at once the important point in the mind of the person that you are dealing with, particularly in a country like America; and therefore the thing which Lord Derby said he would not give arose into supernatural importance in the minds of the Americans, and became the cause of all the differences that we had afterward. Then Lord Clarendon came into office; a negotiation was going on with Mr. Johnson here; I ventured, as I stated to the House of Commons at the time, to express an opinion to Lord Clarendon that it was unwise to settle the question here with Mr. Johnson; first, because the question could only be settled at Washington; and, in the next place, because he was dealing with an administration that was going out on a matter which another administration that was coming in would have to decide upon. The proper course, then, would have been, in my opinion, to have referred the matter to Washington, and left it to be settled at Washington, giving instructions to our minister; and, above all, giving him orders not to assent to any treaty which would be refused by the Senate. What was the objection to that course? None; but that you would give a greater power to the person at Washington than was liked by the foreign office; the consequence was, that our minister at Washington had not the power, though he saw that it would not be accepted by the Senate, to prevent a treaty signed by our government going up there, and both countries became compromised in a manner which might easily have been avoided.

One of the subjects which are most thoroughly investigated in these parliamentary reports is the possible effect of the telegraph upon the diplomatic service. Upon this question all the distinguished gentlemen who testified before the committees agree in the opinion that the use of telegraphic dispatches increases rather than diminishes the necessity for representatives abroad of ability, tact, and quick intelligence. Some of the prominent diplomatists and statesmen who express this opinion are Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, Earl Cowley, Lord John Russell, Hon. Edmund Hammond, Sir H. G. Elliott, and Earl Clarendon. These gentlemen assert that the telegram being necessarily brief, incomplete, often transmitted in cipher, and always liable to error in transmission, leaves more to the judgment of the minister than the extended written dispatch, and increases both his labor and his responsibility. I quote two or three passages as examples of this mass of evidence.

The following question and answer I find in the testimony of Sir H. G. Elliott:

There seems to be an idea that the use of the telegraph diminishes the work of the head of a mission; do you think that it increases it or diminishes it?—I am sure it increases it; I do not think that that admits of a question.

In reply to the inquiry whether the necessity for diplomatic agency has been diminished by telegraphs Lord John Russell says:

No; of course one has to think of these matters, as there has been a great change; but they rather seem to me to increase the necessity for diplomatic agency. Formerly a minister, such a man as Mr. Canning, considered all the contingencies of a case and all the arguments that might be used; and he wrote a long dispatch explaining clearly all those matters, which formed an instruction to the minister, so that the minister was obliged to go and speak to a foreign minister. He had his brief in his hand, and could speak from that brief; but now he asks a question or instructions in a few words, and we send him from the foreign office an answer in a few words. He is obliged to supply, therefore, a great deal more than a minister abroad formerly was obliged to supply.

The testimony of Earl Clarendon is equally explicit. The following question is addressed to him by the chairman of the committee:

With regard to the effect of the telegraph on the relations of the foreign office with the missions abroad, does your lordship think that the responsibility of our ministers and ambassadors at the different courts is so much diminished that it would be for the benefit of the country to put in those posts men of less weight, and men less well paid than at present?

To this Earl Clarendon replies as follows:

No, I do not think that the telegraph has made any such changes desirable; you must remember that a telegram is a condensed dispatch. I have had more trouble sometimes in writing a telegram than in writing a dispatch; as I say, it is condensed. The minister or ambassador must give, as far as he can, all that has led to the facts that he narrates, and that he sends by the wire, and afterward he has to develop his telegram by the first messenger or the post. I do not see that it diminishes his labor the least in the world, and the answers that he gets from the foreign office are more or less concise, too, and it requires, perhaps, more judgment, more discretion, to act upon a telegram than when an instruction is fully set out in a dispatch.

So much I have thought it proper to offer to the House as to the results of English experience in regard to the value of the diplomatic service. Whether we do or do not accept these results in all particulars, we can at least study them with profit.

I have thus presented, though but imperfectly, some of the advantages of a well-conducted diplomatic service. It would seem to be reasonably evident that an able and upright representation abroad allays irritation where it exists, prevents the commission of unfriendly acts, protects citizens in life, liberty, property, and rights of citizenship, advances commerce, secures political advantages, preserves peace, maintains the dignity and social rank of the nation, and wins friendly consideration from all civilized powers. Upon these grounds, setting a high estimate upon the value of the diplomatic service of my own country, I would extend rather than reduce it at the present time. It is, no doubt, in many ways imperfect and includes some inefficient members. But it is on the whole a sound and effective instrument of national advancement. I would remove its defects and give it larger scope. I would send ministers to several points where we are now wholly unrepresented. I would willingly have voted for larger appropriations than are contained in the bill now before the House. But believing this bill to be, under the circumstances, the best that we can get, I shall cheerfully support it. I hope it may pass the House without any reduction of the amounts appropriated in it.

Mr. HOUSE. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3035) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 23, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of Thomas McBride, by his counsel, Mr. Mandeville, setting forth, according to his view of it, an extraordinary state of things in the Territory of Utah respecting the exclusion of what are called Gentiles from settling and taking up lands there, by the location of a large number of city and town sites by the territorial authorities, spreading over almost all the little oases in the Territory, and having no inhabitants, but excluding settlers. The petitioner sets forth the history and application of that in a very interesting way; and while I do not ask that the petition be printed in the RECORD, because it costs too much, I think the statements are such as ought to command everybody's attention. I move, therefore, that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands and be printed, not in the RECORD, but as a short document of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROLLINS presented the petition of Mrs. Lizzie W. Owen, of the city of Washington, daughter of the late General George Wright, brigadier-general of volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa, in favor of the passage of a bill authorizing the location of land scrip due the several counties of that State upon any Government lands open to public entry in any other State or Territory of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa in favor of the passage of a law securing to the State of Iowa the patents for certain lands granted to that State to aid in the construction of certain railroads; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McPHERSON presented a memorial of the Legislature of New Jersey, in favor of an appropriation by Congress to improve the harbors for vessels on the coast of New Jersey, and especially the harbor within Absecon Inlet, at Atlantic City, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, remonstrating against the reduction of duties on iron ore, wrought scrap-iron, and steel rails; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Crawford County, Pennsylvania, praying for such legislation as will prevent fluctuations in freights and unjust discriminations in charges for transportation; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Crawford County, Pennsylvania, praying such an amendment of the patent laws as will protect innocent users of patented articles from prosecution as infringers; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Crawford County, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a department of agriculture; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. RANDOLPH presented resolutions adopted by the Farmers' Club, of Middlesex County, New Jersey, in favor of the establishment of a national board of agriculture; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CONKLING presented the petition of the Brotherhood of Labor, praying for the passage of an act incorporating them under the name and style of "Lincoln Lodge, No. 2;" which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLUMB presented the petition of John C. Fursten and others, citizens of Kansas, praying for the passage of the bill (S. No. 1502) for the relief of certain pre-emptors in the State of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which were referred the bill (S. No. 199) for the relief of Catharine I. Gillis and the bill (H. R. No. 2377) for the relief of Catharine I. Gillis, to report the same with the expression of our opinion, and our reasons for that opinion in writing, that the bills ought not to pass. I ought to say perhaps that some part of the written report may not state the precise views of the committee as it respects a process of reasoning about a matter of law, but the committee all concur for one reason or another in being of opinion that the bills ought not to pass. I am requested, however, by some Senator—I have forgotten whom—to ask that the bills be placed on the Calendar, and so I do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bills will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Robert P. Wilson, late captain in the Fifth United States Cavalry, praying to be restored to his former rank and position in the Army, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 1520) to restore Robert P. Wilson, late captain of the Fifth United States Cavalry, to his former rank and position in the Army.

The bill was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Stephen A. McCarty, late lieutenant-commander United States Navy, praying the passage of a law authorizing the President to restore him to his former position in the Navy, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. No. 96) authorizing the President of the United States to reappoint Stephen A. McCarty a lieutenant-commander in the Navy.

The joint resolution was read twice by its title, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1404) to provide for issuing patents for public lands claimed under the pre-emption and homestead laws in cases where the claimants have become insane, reported it with amendments.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 5089) directing the issue of a duplicate check to Elizabeth D. Thomas, a pensioner of the United States, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1504) refunding to the University of Notre Dame du Lac, of Saint Joseph County, in the State of Indiana, the sum of $2,334.07 in gold coin, that being the amount paid on certain imported articles, &c., reported it with amendments.

He also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 508) for the organization of a secret service bureau in the Treasury Department, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. HAMPTON. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 283) for the relief of Willis N. Arnold, to report it back with a recommendation that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that the case be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. THURMAN. In regard to referring a case to the Court of Claims I think that is a matter that usually is considered by the Senate. It does not pass as a matter of course upon the recommendation of a committee. Let the bill go on the Calendar with that recommendation, and let it come up for action in regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar. Mr. WILLIAMS. To the Committee on Indian Affairs were referred the following bills:

- A bill (S. No. 775) for the relief of John Hensley;
- A bill (S. No. 776) for the relief of Daniel E. Moor;
- A bill (S. No. 777) for the relief of James P. Lindsley;
- A bill (S. No. 778) for the relief of A. J. Henson;
- A bill (S. No. 779) for the relief of E. C. Fuller;
- A bill (S. No. 780) for the relief of R. Vaughn;
- A bill (S. No. 781) for the relief of J. H. Baker;
- A bill (S. No. 782) for the relief of L. W. Vaughn;
- A bill (S. No. 783) for the relief of James Martin & Brothers;
- A bill (S. No. 784) for the relief of John W. Cadwell;
- A bill (S. No. 785) for the relief of C. W. Cooper;
- A bill (S. No. 786) for the relief of William M. Hardin; and
- A bill (S. No. 927) for the relief of William Beddo.

I am instructed by the committee to report that they have expended great labor in collecting the facts and examining the law in these cases. These claims have all been investigated and allowed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. The proof upon which each case was allowed is filed with it, and the law and precedents governing all the cases are filed herewith in a brief marked W. In the opinion of the committee the claims are just and should be paid, but the subject-matter belongs properly to another committee, each bill being a direct appropriation of money out of the Treasury; and for the further reason that most of these bills have been introduced by members of the committee itself. I am instructed to report them back and ask to be relieved from their further consideration, with the request that they be transferred with the accompanying papers to the Committee on Claims.

I will state that upon these bills I have been a sub-committee and have expended a great deal of labor in collecting the proof and precedents and examining the law, and it is all filed in a written brief in these cases. I make this statement in order that the Committee on Claims may act upon them without the trouble and labor of a re-examination.

There are two other bills which were referred the other day to the Committee on Indian Affairs, a bill (S. No. 1238) for the relief of Nathan Butler, of Minneapolis, Minnesota, and a bill (S. No. 1246) for the relief of Field & Hill, which I am also directed to report back with the same recommendation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Committee on Indian Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bills named and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator, as the bills have been once referred to his committee, and there has been a full discussion of them and a full consideration of them, why the committee should not favor us with their opinion upon the matter?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the reasons are assigned in the written report I have made. These bills were all introduced by members of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator permit me to make one additional statement before he replies to my suggestion?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I presume there are probably more than a thousand memorials and bills before the Committee on Claims already. I do not know the exact number, but there are a great many hundreds at any rate. I suppose I shall be justified by the chairman of the Committee on Claims in the statement that a claim now referred to that committee cannot possibly be disposed of during the present Congress. Therefore to refer a bill now to the Committee on Claims is practically to say that no action will be taken upon it during the life of the present Congress; it would have to be introduced again and referred again two years hence. I hope, therefore, the Senate will act upon the bills reported by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will say in answer to the Senator that it did not so strike the Committee on Indian Affairs. We have examined the authorities, the precedents, and collected all the testimony and filed a brief in the cases; but as the bills provide for a direct appropriation of money out of the Treasury, and for the further reason that the bills themselves were introduced by members of that committee, the change of reference is desired. With the exception of myself, I believe every member of that committee has introduced some one of these bills, and as the committee felt a delicacy to report upon their own bills they thought it best that they should ask to be relieved from their further consideration, and that they, together with the papers and proof, succinctly arranged in a brief in the cases, should be referred to the Committee on Claims. I think that committee would have no difficulty in the world in investigating the cases with this aid. I think the committee could report them back to-morrow. The last two bills which I report back are for the direct appropriation of money out of the Treasury.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky if those two bills and the other bills which he has reported back might not properly be considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think not. It was the opinion of the committee, the bills being a money claim and providing for the appropriation of so much money out of the Treasury, that they properly belonged to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Are they claims arising out of Indian depredations?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; all of them are claims of that kind, and all of them have been adjudicated and allowed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Are they or are any of them chargeable to the Indian annuities?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir. That is the trouble; we think it requires an act of Congress. There is a general law which requires that, even where they are paid out of the annuities, the money shall not be paid except by act of Congress. That law I have filed among the papers accompanying the bills.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am aware of that; but I supposed the Committee on Indian Affairs would be more familiar with all questions affecting the Indian annuities than the Committee on Claims.

Mr. COKE. I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin that the Committee on Indian Affairs exercises jurisdiction over all claims that seek satisfaction out of Indian annuities or trust funds which have been administered by the Indian Department, but where a bill provides for an appropriation out of the national Treasury they regard it to be such a claim against the Government as should go to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All these bills are of that sort. They are not for depredations committed by Indian tribes who have annuities in the hands of the Government; they are for depredations by tribes who have none. Under the general law and under the numerous precedents cited in the brief filed with the bills, it is clearly the duty of the Government to pay these claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Indian Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of the bills, and they will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PADDOCK. Some time ago I introduced a bill authorizing the appointment of a commission to investigate all these claims. I inquire if that bill is with those now referred to the Committee on Claims; and if not, what has become of it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; there are other bills in the hands of the committee, not among those reported back to the Senate which have been referred to the Committee on Claims. Several bills are still before the committee, and the bill providing for the appointment of a commission is still before the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to avail myself of this opportunity to invite the special attention of the committee to that bill. It is a very important bill; it covers all the questions that are connected with Indian depredations, and should be considered by the committee at an early day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The committee is fully aware of its importance, and have retained the control of it for the purpose of investigating it.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the bill (H. R. No. 385) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Erwin," and the bill (S. No. 350) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of Robert Erwin," reported them adversely, and with a recommendation that they be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I ask that they go on the Calendar.

Mr. GARLAND. At the request of the Senator from Georgia, I consent that the bills go upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bills will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1154) for the relief of the legal representatives of William O. Redden, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1521) granting a pension to David W. Combs; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1522) for the relief of W. P. Burwell; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire to say in connection with this bill that the same party who applies for this relief has had presented a memorial, which is before the Committee on Claims. I should be very glad if the committee would act upon the bill, instead of the memorial, so that in case of an adverse report it can go on the Calendar. I move that the bill be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1523) to prevent fraudulent claims against the United States, and to discourage speculation therein; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR. I ask leave of the Senate to make a single statement in reference to the bill which I have introduced; it will take but a moment.

The Revised Statutes of the United States, section 3477, provide that—

All transfers and assignments made of any claim upon the United States, or of any part or share thereof, or interest therein, whether absolute or conditional, and whatever may be the consideration therefor, and all powers of attorney, orders, or other authorities for receiving payment of any such claim, or of any part or share thereof, shall be absolutely null and void, unless they are freely made and executed in the presence of at least two attesting witnesses, after the allowance of such a claim, the ascertainment of the amount due, and the issuing of a warrant for the payment thereof.

This statute was manifestly intended to break up the practice of speculating in claims against the Treasury of the United States, to prevent the sale of any such claim, whether absolute or conditional, or of any interest therein, and especially to prevent the acquisition of contingent interests in such claims by attorneys or claim agents with a view of prosecuting them against the Treasury.

This statute seems to be almost wholly unknown to the public; it seems to be unknown to some members of this body. There is now in my hand for consideration a bill which has been referred to the Committee on Claims, reciting that whereas some dozen different named persons had each a separate claim against the United States growing out of a separate cause of action, amounting in the aggregate to many thousands of dollars, and whereas they have each assigned it to a person named in the bill, therefore be it enacted that the assignee be entitled to receive from the Treasury of the United States the amount which those claims aggregate. I had yesterday a letter from a widow residing in the city of Boston, stating that she was interested in a claim against the Geneva award fund, amounting to about $5,000, which was her only property, which had descended to her from an estate of a deceased person of whom she was one of the next of kin, and that the executor of that estate had assigned that claim to a person engaged in prosecuting the necessary legislation for its allowance from the Treasury, who was to receive 50 per cent. of its entire value for the prosecution. Now, I undertake to say that the services of all persons put together, outside of Congress, engaged in procuring legislation on any theory in regard to the disposition of the Geneva award fund have not been worth ten cents to any person interested in the accomplishment of either result. Those claims, whether determined in one way or another, whatever result Congress shall come to, will find on each side able and efficient advocacy from the members of the Senate or the House. This proposed statute which I have introduced proposes to add to the prohibition of the Revised Statutes and to the declaration that such claims are void a penalty upon the assignee.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the bill will cover the case where parties make contracts with collectees. I find that is a very great evil.

Mr. HOAR. If the Judiciary Committee approve the general purpose of the bill they can remedy that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1524) for the relief of F. X. Coincon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1525) for the relief of F. X. Coincon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1526) appropriating money for the erection of a penitentiary in the Territory of Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1527) to repeal section 5176 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. McDONALD, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of George McDougall be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. WITHERS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Robert D. Thornburn be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of William Bowen be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. PLATT, it was Ordered, That George Marshall have leave to withdraw his papers on file with the Secretary of the Senate.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. WITHERS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the post-route bill; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

TOWN SITES IN UTAH TERRITORY.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate:

1. Whether a patent issued to Thomas McBride on the 26th day of September, 1877, for one hundred and sixty acres of land near Grantsville, in the Territory of Utah, and whether such patent has been canceled; and if so, on what facts and grounds and the date thereof;
2. What number of incorporated cities in the Territory of Utah have been reported to the General Land Office, and the reported population of each, the number of acres of land in each city, the number of patents for land granted in each city, with the acreage thus patented; also the number of entries or patents which have been canceled by the Land Department upon complaint of any municipal officer in Utah that such entries or patents cover land within the limits of an incorporated city;
3. Whether there are any facts within his knowledge tending to show that these incorporated cities, or any of them, have been organized with the intent to prevent persons desiring to settle in Utah from obtaining any of the public lands within the corporate limits thereof;
4. Whether there has been in the Interior Department, heretofore, any discrimination in issuing patents for public lands in these so-called cities of Utah, in favor of Mormons and against other persons;
5. That said Secretary transmit to the Senate copies of all papers in the homestead entry of Samuel L. Baker, No. 2065, the homestead entry of Thomas McBride, No. 381, and in the cash entry of James A. Williamson, No. 378, all from the United States land office at Salt Lake City, Utah Territory.

NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the call of the Calendar of General Orders under the standing order of the day.

The bill (S. No. 1282) to incorporate the National Educational Association was announced as being first in order upon the Calendar, and its consideration was resumed, as in Committee of the Whole.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Sundry amendments have been proposed to the bill by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY,] which will be reported in their order.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 26, after the word "associates," it is proposed to strike out the words "the officers and members of the association known as the National Educational Association."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment is to insert at the end of section 1 the words:

For the purpose of collecting and diffusing information in regard to education in the United States, and for no other purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment is in section 2, line 4, after the word "estate," to insert "in the District of Columbia;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That the National Educational Association shall have power to make and amend its constitution, by-laws, and rules, consistently with law, and to hold, by purchase, grant, gift, or otherwise, real or personal estate in the District of Columbia, not exceeding $50,000 in value.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment is at the end of section 2, to add:

For the purpose mentioned in the first section of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I simply desire to state, without consuming the time of the Senate, that I am opposed on principle to the wisdom and the policy of this class of legislation. I do not believe that Congress has the power to enact legislation of the character of this bill. I do not believe, if it had the power, it would be wise or judicious to exercise it in special cases of this kind. If the gentlemen named desire an incorporation of this character, ample provision is furnished under the laws of the District of Columbia authorizing the incorporation of companies in the District.

Mr. CONKLING. Has the Senator that statute before him?

Mr. COCKRELL. I have not the statute. I will have it in a moment. Ample provision is made—

Mr. INGALLS. I can call the attention of the Senate to the statute.

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. INGALLS. There is ample power under the law of Congress as it now exists in regard to acts of incorporation in the District of Columbia for this association to incorporate themselves if the objects and purposes are what they have been stated to be by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] Section 545 of the laws relating to the District of Columbia is as follows:

Any three or more persons of full age, citizens of the United States, a majority of whom shall be citizens of the District, who desire to associate themselves for benevolent, charitable, educational, literary, musical, scientific, religious, or missionary purposes, including societies formed for mutual improvement or for the promotion of the arts, may make, sign, and acknowledge before any officer authorized to take acknowledgment of deeds in the District, and file in the office of the recorder of deeds, to be recorded by him, a certificate in writing, in which shall be stated—

What is then provided? So that under the statute that now exists there is full power for these persons to associate themselves, and thus prevent the statute-book from being lumbered with special acts of incorporation.

Mr. MORRILL. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the provision which he has just read. It provides that the majority of such an association shall be residents of the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS. That is a very wholesome provision and is intended to guard against the very mischief that this bill is open to. The object should be to provide that the incorporators shall be citizens of the District, and not to allow persons from different States in the Union to come here and obtain special privileges by act of Congress, and obtain the possession of property that shall thereby become exempt from taxation, because I believe if this bill is passed the property that these incorporators acquire will immediately be exempt from taxation on the ground that it is held for educational and literary and benevolent purposes. There is to-day a larger per cent. of property in the District of Columbia held for these purposes now exempt from taxation than in any other portion of the territory of the United States. It is invidious; it is pernicious and unjust.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thank the Senator from Kansas for his suggestions in regard to the law. There is no question on that point. These parties have adequate remedy for all they ask, under the general laws of the District. Now they come to Congress for what purpose? Not for the naked legal authority to transact the business they propose, but to give flavor, significance, importance to their object—a special incorporation. I say the history of these special incorporations by Congress will not justify Congress in repeating them. We have had a National Capital Life Insurance Company, I believe the title of it is, and we have had that matter back in Congress year by year, a subject of continual controversy.

For the benefit of my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. BAILEY,] who is so anxious that this bill shall pass, I desire to call his attention to an act which was passed in 1860, in the days of the true democracy, when the democratic party controlled this Senate. It is "An act to incorporate the United States Agricultural Society." I call the attention of the Senator and of my brother democratic Senators to what was done on that occasion, which they will find on record. It was a bill almost precisely similar to this, with a name from each of the States of the Union, to get up a national agricultural association. It came to the Senate; and the name of every person was stricken out of it who was not a resident of the District of Columbia, and the democratic Senate of 1860 refused positively to grant a charter of incorporation to a company of this character, and all such names being stricken out it was left:

That William W. Corcoran, Benjamin B. French, Benjamin Ogle Tayloe, Ben. Perley Poore, and John A. Smith, their associates and successors—

All of whom were residents of the district of Columbia. I say it has been against the practice and usage of the Senate to grant this kind of an act of incorporation; and if there is any principle on earth that is democratic it is true for the democracy. On this question I desire the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAILEY. I cannot for my life understand the opposition this bill, which is certainly for a very laudable purpose, has aroused on the part of the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Missouri. It is a bill to incorporate certain persons as a National Educational Association. They are citizens of the United States who are already associated together without a corporate existence for purposes connected with the education of the youth of the country. These are but the representatives of the school-masters of the country, three hundred thousand or more in number, of whom ten thousand are constituents of the Senator from Missouri, for more than ten thousand schoolmasters are employed to-day in the common schools of that great State. They desire to be incorporated in order to make their association more efficient. They ask no privileges. They simply ask that they may be endowed with the capacity to hold property to the amount of $50,000 for the purpose of their association, to enable them to gather facts and statistics and information upon matters connected with educational interest and publish them to the country. And I may say here that we have an educational bureau in connection with the Government of the United States, which has been certainly of some value to the people of these United States, and the most valuable adjunct of that educational bureau is the very association of which I am now speaking.

These gentlemen have been in the habit of assembling from year to year, sometimes in the city of Washington, sometimes elsewhere, and discussing the methods of teaching adopted in the different States of the Union or abroad, and bringing to the attention of their fellow-teachers all the improvements and all the suggestions of the most matured minds and the best educators everywhere.

It is said that this is objectionable because some of these people live without the District of Columbia. They are citizens of the United States, and they have an interest in the affairs of the District of Columbia. They certainly should not be excluded because they do not live in this District. The Senator from Kansas need but go back to the records of the State of Kansas to find that the corporations of that State of every kind are endowed with corporate existence by the Legislature who sent him here, and in many instances, perhaps the majority, the incorporators are not citizens of his own State.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the statement the Senator makes?

Mr. BAILEY. I simply say it is the common practice of the Legislatures of the several States to create corporations whose incorporators are not altogether citizens of the State, or a majority of whom may not be its citizens.

Mr. INGALLS. We have a general incorporation law in Kansas, under which the persons desiring those privileges are required to organize.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; but under the general law that exists in the District of Columbia with respect to these organizations a majority of the incorporators must be citizens of the District of Columbia or residents of the District of Columbia. Under that law these persons cannot be organized as a corporation; and it is to relieve them of this embarrassment and this difficulty that Congress is appealed to and asked to enact this law. Where is the harm in it? What wrong can be done?

The Senator from Kansas says that it will encumber the statute-book. The Senator from Missouri says it is antidemocratic. I have never known, Mr. President, that the democratic party was opposed to the cause of education. I do not believe it to-day. I believe that the members of the democratic party are much interested in the subject of education; and certainly the great democratic States of the South—I include my own, the State of Tennessee—are interested in it, and interested because they feel the necessity of providing education for all the youth of the country.

I trust, Mr. President, the objections which have been made will not be sufficient in the estimation of Senators to defeat the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senator sits down I wish to ask him a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. INGALLS. What is the necessity of having incorporators named who reside outside of the District of Columbia, if the object and purpose of this measure has been properly stated by the Senator from Vermont? Three men can organize as well as one hundred. They can hold property under that statute, and can exercise all the powers and privileges that are conferred by this bill. Why is it necessary, therefore, that one hundred or two hundred men should be selected when under this law three men can acquire all the privileges they desire?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly, three persons can acquire the privilege, but it would be a privilege that belonged to the three.

Mr. INGALLS. No; they can hold and enjoy real estate.

Mr. BAILEY. These are representatives of the school interest in every State in the Union, I believe, and almost every Territory. The persons who are here named as incorporators are gentlemen who are in the habit of meeting once or more yearly for the purpose of comparing opinions and views for the purpose of bringing into a common stock the information they have.

Mr. INGALLS. It is not necessary they should be named as incorporators in this bill to enable them to meet in the city of Washington.

Mr. BAILEY. Not certainly for them to meet in the City of Washington, but it is surely necessary that their names shall be mentioned in the bill in order that they may be incorporators as they desire; in other words, if you refer them to the laws of the District of Columbia they cannot become incorporators, and will have nothing to do with the management and the guidance and control of the affairs of their own association. But it is desired to give this interest in every part of the country a voice; to make citizens of Kansas and of Tennessee, as well as of Vermont and of Massachusetts, interested in this great matter, to take part in this association. It is a matter of great national interest, of national importance. It concerns, as I conceive, every child in the country; it is of interest to every school-master in the country. As I stated a while ago three hundred thousand and more men are interested in this. It is a great interest. They are among the most intelligent and cultured of our people; they are certainly doing a work that is not second in importance to the work that is being done to-day by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] commenced his remarks by asking the question, What harm can come from the passage of this bill? It seems to me that the first question that should address itself to the mind of a Senator when a bill is proposed to be passed is this, What power, what right under the Constitution have we to pass the bill? Now I ask the Senator from Tennessee to turn over and read the whole of the Constitution of the United States and place his hand upon one provision of it that authorizes the passage of such a bill as this. It is true the Constitution provides that "the Congress shall have power to promote the progress of science and useful arts," but it limits the manner in which that shall be done; the power is—

To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries.

Why, Mr. President, this character of bills coming before this body and the other House is a matter of modern origin. They come now almost every day, asking the organization of companies for every conceivable purpose.

Mr. BAILEY. May I ask if Congress has not power, as the Legislature for the District of Columbia, to enact laws providing for the creation of corporations in the District of Columbia?

Mr. HEREFORD. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Kansas says the law already exists.

Mr. HEREFORD. Certainly Congress has that power. Every one who has spoken on the subject has conceded that power to Congress; and Congress alone has the whole power over the District of Columbia. It may incorporate any number of the citizens of the District of Columbia for the purpose designated in this bill.

But the question which arises and which has been propounded to the Senator before is, what power has Congress to incorporate the citizens of any and of all the States and Territories outside of the District of Columbia for such a purpose as this? That is the question that arises in this case. Strike out the names of those who do not live in the District of Columbia, and there is no objection to the bill except the objection that there is no necessity for it, because you have a general law on that subject applicable to the District of Columbia.

Then this bill provides further:

And whenever called upon by any Department of the Government shall investigate and report upon any educational subject without compensation for such services.

Immediately connecting this incorporated company with the Government. I presume the first thing that will take place they will ask us to print their reports. So this thing has been widening and extending for the last ten or fifteen years until it is certainly time for us to stop and reflect and see where we are going in this direction. Individuals who cannot get such special privileges from their own States are every day coming to Congress and asking these special privileges. Let them confine themselves to their States and to their Territories, and if we want to incorporate companies like this let us confine them to citizens of the District of Columbia.

The Senator from Tennessee has not answered the question, where, from what portion of the Constitution he gets the power for Congress to incorporate the citizens of any or all the States for such a purpose as this, to form an incorporated company for educational purposes composed of citizens outside of the District of Columbia? Where?

Mr. BAILEY. I take it for granted that the Legislature of the State which the gentleman represents on the floor of the Senate has the power to incorporate, if it should be disposed to do so, citizens of the State of New York and grant them certain rights and certain privileges within the territorial limits of the State of West Virginia. So I do not see any difficulty whatever in this case.

Mr. HEREFORD. The Senator from Tennessee must be too good a lawyer not to know the difference between the powers of the Constitution of the United States and the powers of the constitution of a State. We, under the Constitution of the United States, have no powers, except those expressly delegated. The condition of the States under their constitutions is very different; so decided by all the courts. They have all the power that has not been delegated to Congress.

Mr. HARRIS. Congress has the same power in the District.

Mr. HEREFORD. Certainly; Congress has the same power in the District. If it can do this, there is no company that it cannot incorporate for any purpose whatever; there is no limit to its power.

Mr. BAILEY. I will ask the Senator from West Virginia if, in his opinion, Congress has not the power to organize such a corporation as this within the District of Columbia? Where is the objection?

Mr. HEREFORD. Provided you confine it to citizens of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the objection is that these corporators are not all of them citizens of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEREFORD. That is the objection that has been made to it all the time, from the first.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Why use the term "national"?

Mr. BAILEY. Simply to designate the character of the association. It is for the purpose of gathering information from every part of the United States; it is for the purpose of gathering statistics and facts and publishing them; and let me say to the Senator now that the proceedings of this very association are being published to-day. Many of them have been adopted by the Bureau of Education, and are being published and sent forth broadcast through the land. Let me say another thing; they are not only welcomed but they are sought after in every part of this country; they are sought after by the superintendents of the boards of State education; they are sought after by the presidents and professors and tutors in the colleges; they are sought after by the common-school masters; they are being sought after by the pupils in the schools themselves.

This association has been doing good, is doing good, and will do good. Whether the Congress of the United States shall choose to incorporate it or not, it will continue to do good, for the enterprise, the energy, the devotion of these men to the cause in which they are so much interested is so great that they will not cease from their efforts because the Congress of the United States may choose to say "we will refuse to you a charter of organization and refuse to you the conveniences and advantages which would flow from it."

The objection that this is an unconstitutional act simply because some of the corporators live outside of the District of Columbia, it seems to me has so little in it that I do not choose to say a word about it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, when the Constitution conferred upon Congress the power of governing the District of Columbia I take it the framers of that instrument did not contemplate the government of a city in a desert. They expected that this ten miles square, with the three cities which it would contain, would be filled with such a population as would make up the capital of a great, free, enlightened nation; that it would be the place of residence of its public men, Representatives and Senators of States, judges of its national courts, men charged with its judicial, legislative, and executive functions; and they expected that Congress would provide for and would promote such enterprises as belonged and would as civilization progressed belong to such a capital. Washington left abundant evidence of his expectation, Jefferson left abundant evidence of his expectation that Congress would deal with the District of Columbia in that spirit. Washington selected a site for a national university; Jefferson urged the establishment of such a university to be resorted to by the entire people at the national charge.

Now, Mr. President, if in the capital of any State in this country it was found convenient for a national agricultural society, for an American academy of arts and sciences, for a national medical society, for a national educational society like this, or for any other association for the improvement of art, or learning, or science in any of its branches, we should set down the people of that State as churlish and barbarous who should refuse to grant them an incorporation and should refuse to include, if that association desired, the names of members from all parts of the country or from all parts of the world. If the city of Washington does not want this association, let these parties apply to the State of Massachusetts, and her Legislature will grant them the incorporation, not confining it to citizens of that State. She could not live as a member of a nation made up of an aggregate of enlightened States if she should refuse. Now, have we not the constitutional authority to do for Washington what the State of Massachusetts can do for Boston and the State of Rhode Island for Providence? The ornaments of this city are not its structures of granite or marble; they are its libraries, its schools, its learned societies, the men of fame and of education and of attainment and of high character who collect here and form a part of its society.

I, therefore, find, Mr. President, in the authority to govern the capital city of the United States the power to create such instrumentalities and such conveniences as are necessary for the carrying on of such enterprises as properly belong to a capital city. Here the presidents of the various universities and colleges of the country and other learned men desire to select Washington as the seat of their association and as the place for their annual meeting. In order to do that conveniently, it is necessary that they should have a little fund properly invested which will pay for the expense of their publications and perhaps provide them with a place of meeting. If they honor Washington by such a request, cannot Congress do for Washington and in Washington what the Legislature of any other State would do for its principal city?

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States declares that "the Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States." Congress, therefore, becomes the legislature of these ten miles square, with exclusive powers in all cases whatsoever. Hence whatever legislative powers may be exercised by the Legislature of a State, Congress can exercise for the District of Columbia. If, then, the Legislature of a State could incorporate such a company, Congress can incorporate this company; and thus it occurs to me that the constitutional point made by the Senator from Missouri is not well taken. The point made by the Senator from Kansas it occurs to me is not well taken, because the act to which he referred requires the majority of the stockholders or incorporators to live within the District of Columbia. If a State Legislature has the power to incorporate this or any other company and embrace in the articles of incorporation citizens of other States, a majority if you please, Congress has that power. It is only necessary to look at the grants to incorporated companies in any State of this Union, and you will find that citizens of other States are made part of the incorporators by their acts.

It will be borne in mind—and on this point I call the attention of gentlemen to the Madison papers—that in most if not all of the original drafts of a constitution which was presented to the committee of eleven there was a clause authorizing Congress to establish a university, and when the report of the committee of eleven was made and that question came up and it was suggested that there was no provision made for incorporating a university, the remark was made that the power was complete in the grant of exclusive legislation over the ten miles ceded for the capital. I believe that remark was made by Mr. Sherman. There was not a single dissenting voice to this remark when it was made in that convention; and certainly those men knew what powers they intended to confer.

Then the only question left in my judgment is, is this a wise thing to do? If it be, if the effect of this will be to educate the educators all through the United States—and that is the great purpose and object—by educating the teachers you thus educate the children of this country, black and white, all through this great land, we shall have done a good thing. Sir, I am a common-school man; I believe in common schools and I believe in educating teachers to educate children; and if this will aid in the accomplishment of that great object it is a thing that is entirely constitutional in itself, beyond all question in my judgment, and it is the right thing to do.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the object of this bill is so commendable and so much to be respected that even seeming to object to it at any stage requires an explanation. The other day when it was presented I made some observations in the nature of objections, thinking then and thinking now that they were well grounded. The bill as it came from the committee enabled the corporators to hold property, real or personal, anywhere and everywhere as I understood it, and nowhere did the bill confine the objects of the corporation to the prosecution of educational purposes or interests. I did not feel quite sure that almost any sort of business might not be carried on under the bill as it was at first proposed. Now, the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] by amendments has confined the franchise to hold property to the District of Columbia, and he has narrowed the scope of the bill to the purpose of education.

The objection made to it now by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD], if I understand him, is that it transcends the Constitution because it does not require the incorporators to be resident within this District. I can hardly see a foundation for that objection. If it be a good one, the general incorporation act now on the statute-book is unconstitutional. Why? Because that act provides that three or more persons, a majority of whom shall be residents of the District of Columbia, may incorporate themselves. I need not remind the Senator from West Virginia that that is wholly, specifically I might say, a legislative declaration that a portion of the corporators need not be residents of the District: Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. So that if the Senator be right in supposing that a condition precedent to the power of Congress touching the institution of a corporation in this District is that the members of that corporation, all of them, must reside in the District, his objection would be fatal to the statute to which I have called attention.

Mr. HEREFORD. The Senator will allow me to say that the fact that the act allows that would not be an answer to the argument of unconstitutionality.

Mr. CONKLING. No, it would not, and perhaps my reference to the statute requires or seems to require an explanation. The force of the argument derivable from the statute is this: Having been on the statute-book a number of years; having received, as it must have done, the sanction of both Houses of Congress and of the Executive; never, that I know of, having been challenged in any court or any other forum, it is, I think, persuasive and instructive to the point that a large body of persons, enlightened in this regard, have thought it competent and within the Constitution. It is for that reason that I cite it, although, as the Senator from West Virginia well says, if the argument is a sound one the fact that such a statute exists would not refute it.

The object then, Mr. President, seems to be to enable persons, a majority of whom do not reside in this District, to become corporators. Sympathizing entirely with all that has been said as to the motives for this legislation, and wishing entirely to promote all the ends in view, it seems to me that had I been going to draw a bill to effect the purpose now announced, I should have preferred simply an enactment that in this case the provisions of this general statute requiring a majority of the corporators to live in the District should not apply. The advantage of such a statute, it seems to me, would be twofold. First, it would be very simple and brief; second, this incorporation would become subject to the presumably well-matured provisions of a general act which is established and understood.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] makes a remark to me which evidently he does not expect me to repeat to the Senate, and, therefore, I forbear to mention it, although it is a very suggestive remark and in the line of my argument at this moment, which is that the advantage of a general statute of incorporation is that presumably it is matured carefully and likely to be understood; and that argument has induced many of the States to put an end to special charters and by general law to provide for incorporations. Such is the practice and the law in my own State; such a Senator on my right has announced that it is in his; and such I think will be found to be the tendency and judgment of recent times. Here is a general statute sufficient and applicable in all respects of which we have heard, except that the Senator from Vermont says, and says justly, it requires a majority of the incorporators to reside in the District. Now, if for reasons which have been assigned, this individual case is exceptional in that behalf, a very simple mode, it seems to me, would be to declare by act of Congress that in this instance a majority need not reside in the District, to waive that particular condition. But that was matter of consideration for the committee; and the committee having considered it, I beg to say that I do not make this suggestion by way of criticism but simply for what it is worth; and I do not think that if such a bill was proposed, having the same effect that this bill will have, namely, to enable persons not resident here, in numbers larger than a minority, to enter into this incorporation, it would thereby transcend the Constitution or warrant us in voting against it for that reason.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. HOAR. I beg leave before this matter goes over to make one observation in connection with what has been said by the Senator from New York, which I think perhaps will satisfy him that it is better to have a special statute in this instance. It would be necessary to qualify the general law not only in the matter he has suggested but in other respects. This corporation desires and expects to be limited to a very small amount of property, instead of being left, as the general law leaves it, indefinite. That would be another necessity for a special enactment. Moreover, this corporation offers and consents to perform certain public duties of investigation and inquiry gratuitously at the demand of the Government; so that it would require to modify the general law in these three particulars if the substance of this bill is preserved in all of them.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will allow the vote to be taken at this time.

Mr. GARLAND. If a vote can be taken I shall yield. Otherwise I must claim the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not desire to discuss the bill further. As I have frequently said, its sole purpose is to authorize this association to receive donations so that they may publish their annual volume of proceedings.

Mr. GARLAND. I shall proceed, I believe. I see several Senators appear to be claiming the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not understand that any one desires to prolong the discussion.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to say a few words.

Mr. GARLAND. I will proceed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1509) to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

GENEVA AWARD FUND.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1194) for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. HOAR, on the 17th instant, to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu insert:

That an act approved June 23, 1874, entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," be, and the same hereby is, revived, re-enacted, and continued, all the provisions thereof to take effect from and after the approval of this act, except as changed or modified by this act.

SEC. 2. That the number of judges for said court shall be three, and the agreement of two of the judges shall be necessary to decide any question arising before said court.

SEC. 3. That the judges of the court hereby re-established shall convene and organize in the city of Washington as soon as practicable after their appointment; and the court so organized shall exist eighteen months; and all claims provable under this act shall be verified and filed with the clerk of said court within six months from its organization, or they shall be held to be waived and barred. And should it be found impracticable to complete the work of the said court, before the expiration of the said eighteen months, the President may, by proclamation, extend the time of the duration thereof to a period not more than twelve months beyond the expiration of the said eighteen months; and in such case all the provisions of this act shall be taken and held to be the same as though the continuance of the said court had been originally fixed by this act at the limit to which it may be thus extended.

SEC. 4. That such court shall consider and allow all claims properly proved, and not heretofore adjudicated directly resulting from damage done on the high seas by confederate cruisers during the late rebellion, including vessels and cargoes attacked and taken on the high seas, or pursued by them therefrom, although the loss or damage occurred within three miles of the shore, which claims shall be considered as claims of the first class; and shall also consider and allow as a second class claims for the payment of premiums for war risks, whether paid to corporations, agents, or individuals, after the sailing of any confederate cruiser; in determining which it shall be the duty of the court to deduct any sum in any way received by or paid to the claimant in diminution of the amount paid for any such premium, so that the actual loss only shall be allowed.

SEC. 5. That the judgments rendered by said court under this act shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the money paid to the United States pursuant to article 7 of the treaty of Washington, and the interest accruing therefrom, not expended in payment of claims heretofore proved and allowed under the provisions of said original act, and the act extending the time for the filing of claims thereunder, and of expenses under this act.

SEC. 6. That judgments rendered in the first class shall be first paid. If the sum of money remaining after provision for expenses and the judgments, with interest, in cases of the first class so unappropriated shall be insufficient to pay the claims of the second class in full, they shall be paid pro rata.

SEC. 7. That if after payment with interest at 4 per cent. of judgments rendered in the first and second classes and the expenses under this act, there shall remain sufficient of the said money, 10 per cent. in addition to the compensation provided for in the said original act and in this act shall be paid therefrom by the Secretary of the Treasury in lieu of freight upon the value of whaling-vessels and outfits as found by said court. If after payment of the said judgments and expenses and the said 10 per cent. any of said money shall remain, it shall be thus paid as additional interest upon judgments which were rendered under the original act and judgments of the first class rendered under this act, at such rate per cent., not exceeding 2 per cent. per annum, as it shall prove sufficient for.

SEC. 8. That this act shall not be construed as in any way renewing, extending, or continuing any of the commissions or appointments of judges or officers of the said court of commissioners of Alabama claims issued and made by virtue of said original act.

SEC. 9. That all moneys necessary for the payment of the salaries of the judges and officers authorized by this act, and for the lawful expenses of the said court hereby re-established, are hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; all of which shall be reimbursed out of the said unexpended moneys before any of the judgments rendered under this act shall be paid.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, there has been a great deal of literature put forth in the Congress of the United States, in the newspapers, and in the law periodicals of the country on the subject of the Geneva award for several years last past; so much so in fact that the subject has become somewhat threadbare. Hence at this late day no one in the Senate can complain if there is not much attention paid to the discussion of it by any member of this body. Nevertheless, the main question is one of very great importance in itself, and it involves some very intricate questions of law and public policy which never grow old, and which retain their interest all the time; and to those at least who are accustomed to look into such matters mental pleasure is experienced by considering them.

The distribution of the Geneva award, it has occurred to me for a long time past, should have been regulated by imposing on the Attorney-General of the United States the duty of filing in some court a bill in the nature of a bill of interpleader, calling upon all parties who considered themselves interested in that fund to propound their claims and have them adjudicated. Among the many propositions that have been offered in both Houses with regard to the distribution of the fund, I believe Judge Poland, of Vermont, did introduce a bill of that kind in the lower House; but after much discussion the act of 1874 was passed, which to a certain extent disposed of the matter, and under which a portion of the fund was distributed. On all hands, however, it is now considered better that the Congress of the United States in disposing of the balance of the fund should graft, so to speak, upon that act and continue proceedings as far as may be under it, at the same time not committing ourselves to any provision in that act, as it has been claimed on this floor by some Senators heretofore we ought to do. That was only a distribution of part of the fund. It was like the case of a person paying money into a court when his duty to do so was controverted, but waiving the question as to his duty he paid so much into the court to be administered as might be found proper, reserving all rights as to the balance as to how that should be administered and what course it should take. So the act of 1874, while it disposed of so much of the fund as was then distributed, left the question open; at least we are not estopped by it as to the balance of the fund. Now, a balance remains of about $9,500,000, and the question is, what shall be done with that?

In order to ascertain distinctly what shall be done with it it is important to know exactly how we got hold of the fund—the circumstances and the facts connected with that money finding its way into the Treasury of the United States. My opinion is that when all these facts are known, when the whole transaction is made manifest to the minds of Senators, there cannot be much doubt left as to what should be done with it. We may have our wishes and our preferences as to what we would like to do with it; but those who examine the subject carefully will, I think, conclude that at last there is a pure, naked, legal question lying at the bottom of the whole matter, and that our duty is a plain one. I hold that under the way and manner according to the facts in which we got hold of this fund we are not at liberty to enter into the field of charity or to explore the ground of mercy or of compassion; but we are compelled under the stern written law of the award itself to distribute it in a certain way.

As has been stated repeatedly and as is a fact now known to the country, this money came into our Treasury as the result of the want of the exercise of due diligence on the part of Great Britain in preventing the confederate cruisers from arming themselves and departing from her ports and committing depredations upon the property of the United States and its citizens. There was a dispute on that point between Great Britain and the United States. In order to settle that dispute amicably and not go to war it was determined that it should be arbitrated. A commission for this purpose was formed under the treaty of Washington which sat at Geneva to consider the whole subject. When the commission was organized it proceeded under three rules which were recognized by the treaty and which I will now read to the Senate. I take them from Mr. Cushing's work on the treaty of Washington, pages 22, 23:

In deciding the matters submitted to the arbitrators it is provided that they shall be governed by certain rules, which are agreed upon by the parties as rules to be taken as applicable to the case, and by such principles of international law, not inconsistent therewith, as the arbitrators shall determine to have been applicable to the case, which rules are as follows:

A neutral government—

England was neutral between the United States and the Confederate States, then a recognized belligerent, during the war:

A neutral government is bound—

First, to use due diligence to prevent the fitting out, arming, or equipping, within its jurisdiction, of any vessel which it has reasonable ground to believe is intended to cruise or to carry on war against a power with which it is at peace; and also to use like diligence to prevent the departure from its jurisdiction of any vessel intended to cruise or carry on war as above, such vessel having been specially adapted, in whole or in part, within such jurisdiction, to warlike use.

Secondly, not to permit or suffer either belligerent to make use of its ports or waters as the base of naval operations against the other, or for the purpose of the renewal or augmentation of military supplies or arms or the recruitment of men.

Thirdly, to exercise due diligence in its own ports and waters, and, as to all persons within its jurisdiction, to prevent any violation of the foregoing obligations and duties.

There we have the programme, so to speak, by which this high commission was to proceed, and the light by which it was to be guided in arriving at a conclusion as to how much money should be paid for this want of due diligence on the part of Great Britain, if any should be established. The commission met under these rules. A call was then made for the claims under these three rules that were to be adjudicated by the commission. I have made a memorandum of the different claims that were put forward and their dates: claims national and private were laid before the arbitrators. The national or governmental claims are in this order:

First. For the destruction of vessels and property belonging to the Government.

Second. National expenses in the pursuit of the cruisers.

Third. Loss in transferring the American commercial marine to the British flag.

Fourth. Prolongation of the war and additional expenses in carrying on the war and suppressing the rebellion.

These were the national or governmental claims for losses as asserted before the high commission. The private claims—and mark you they were kept distinct all the time—were:

First, for the destruction of vessels and property of individuals;

Second, the damages or injuries growing out of the destruction of vessels; and Third, the enhanced payment of insurance, or rather the war premiums.

The Senate must keep in mind throughout this entire discussion that this was the declaration which was filed by the United States on the part of herself for her national or governmental losses and on the part of her citizens for their individual losses. Debate followed, and an adjournment was had. The commission on due consideration excluded damages as to what? As to the prolongation of the war, as to transferring American commerce, and also as to the enhanced payment of insurance or the war premiums. That was the solemn adjudication of the commission after they had had this matter debated and after an adjournment and due consideration had upon the proposition; and that was published to the world.

I will remark here, Mr. President, that throughout the annals of jurisprudence, within my knowledge at least, an abler presentation and a more powerful argumentation of the claims of the United States or of any government was never presented than was presented by the counsel of the United States in urging these very matters that were excluded by the commission. Indeed there is no treatise on the subject of damages that has ever fallen under my observation which can compare in power and force and logic with the debate on the part of the counsel for the United States on these propositions before that commission.

The tribunal, however, determined to exclude everything except, in the language of their opinion, the direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the insurgent cruisers. If the Government lost her property by those acts, of course the Government was entitled to compensation, the same as were individuals. There, within a smaller compass than your hand, the commission put its entire conclusions. The commission limited its inquiries to what we call now the incaptured cruisers, the Florida, the Alabama, and the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne, with the four tenders that belonged to the Alabama and the Florida. As to all the other cruisers, whatever depredations they may have committed on the high seas, they were exculpated and no losses as to them were allowed.

Article 11 of the treaty of Washington bound the two governments to abide by this submission, and they submitted everything that was in dispute in reference to these matters to the commission. Another article, the seventh, required the arbitrators to state separately their conclusion as to each vessel. The various claims were presented fully by the United States; counter claims were presented by the British government, as the treaty authorized; and the whole matter was thus laid before the commission on the submission.

Now, Mr. President, presenting it not directly in the order in which it comes—but it comes in here very well—I wish to refer to what was said by the agent of the United States Government in presenting the case for his Government. In doing it he said this, which is very important I think in this investigation:

It thus appears that these computations—

That is, the computations in the statement he was presenting—show the entire extent of all private losses, which the results of the adjudication of this tribunal ought to enable the United States to make compensation for.—Third volume Geneva Papers, page 579.

The Senate will observe the expression, "these computations show the entire extent of all private losses, which the results of the adjudication of this tribunal ought to enable the United States to make compensation for," not "to make compensation to the United States herself," but "to place the money in the hands of the United States that she may make compensation for the private losses." That is the language of the agent of the United States in submitting his computation to the tribunal to pass upon.

Before going further on that branch of the subject I wish to read what Mr. Cushing says in his work upon the exclusion of the national losses, and he heads this portion of his book: "Decision of the arbitrators respecting national losses," and Mr. Cushing, like the Senator from Massachusetts who addressed the Senate so well and so ably the other day, [Mr. HOAR,] is not pleased with the finding of the high commission upon these points; but that is not the question now for us to deal with. We are not the high commission. Let us keep that in mind as we progress. We are to dispose of a certain estate sent to us by the high commission. That is our duty. I am not so sure but what I would concur, if it were an original question, with the Senator from Massachusetts as well as with Mr. Cushing upon the impropriety or illegality of some of their findings, but nevertheless they found as they did and sent the fund to us stamped and impressed with a certain character. Mr. Cushing says:

It will be taken for granted that in the interval between the 15th and 19th of June communications by telegraph passed between the respective agents and their governments, and consultations took place between the counsel of both sides and the respective agents, either orally or in writing, and with more or less formality among the arbitrators, the result of which was announced by Count Sclopis as follows:

"The arbitrators do not propose to express or imply any opinion upon the point thus in difference between the two governments as to the interpretation or effect of the treaty, but it seems to them obvious that the substantial object of the adjournment must be to give the two governments an opportunity of determining whether the claims in question shall or shall not be submitted to the decision of the arbitrators, and that any difference between the two governments on this point may make the adjournment unproductive of any useful effect, and, after a delay of many months, during which both nations may be kept in a state of painful suspense, may end in a result which it is to be presumed both governments would equally deplore, that of making this arbitration wholly abortive. This being so, the arbitrators think it right to state that after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations; and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there were no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon. With a view to the settlement of the other claims, to the consideration of which by the tribunal no exception has been taken on the part of Her Britannic Majesty's government, the arbitrators have thought it desirable to lay before the parties this expression of the views they have formed upon the question of public law involved, in order that, after this declaration by the tribunal, it may be considered by the Government of the United States whether any course can be adopted respecting the first-mentioned claims which would relieve the tribunal from the necessity of deciding upon the present application of Her Britannic Majesty's government."

That was the enunciation by Count Sclopis of the decision of the commission. When that decision was published and came to this country it was accepted by the State Department by the instruction of the Executive as being satisfactory, and the investigation proceeded then purely and simply upon the private losses and the losses which the Government herself may have sustained if she had any property in vessels destroyed by the inculpated cruisers.

The consideration of this subject has given me considerable trouble. I did not at first know, and I have not yet been able to ascertain, why it was that the commission did reach this conclusion; but at last I have some kind of a lingering idea that perhaps the British government—or, if not the British government, perhaps the high commission itself, with that important trust in its hands—did not attach the importance to what were called "belligerent rights" that the Confederate States attached to them at the time they were accorded and that sometimes the United States attached to them, but not always pursuing and enforcing them in the most consistent manner. My impression is that the commission said in effect, "We are unwilling to establish the precedent that because seceding provinces," as they are called in the European world—not rebellious States—"may win two or three important battles and may maintain armies in the field successfully for a few years, they may be put upon the plane of belligerent rights accorded as ordinarily accepted and understood in the law of nations," and I think I find the explanation in Phillips's Jurisprudence, written in reference to this very particular subject of the belligerent rights accorded to the Southern States when they were at war with the General Government. After discussing the question generally Mr. Phillips comes down to this particular instance, and says:

In the first place, it will become necessary to decide whether the seceding province is to be recognized as a belligerent or not. This is, as we have already seen, a question of fact which must depend upon the military possibilities of the case. But its affirmative decision, whether right or wrong, is far from possessing the significance which has sometimes been absurdly attributed to it. It binds the recognizing State to nothing whatever. It is in fact considered as an international transaction, a mere nullity. Correctly understood it is nothing but a public notice that the recognizing State has formed a certain judgment concerning certain facts, and that its public servants are therefore to be held exempt from personal responsibility in acting accordingly. It means no more than this: These men are at war for a purpose with whose justice we have nothing to do; but we are of opinion that they have shown a strength and a determination which entitle them to be treated as a belligerent power, or in other words, as a combatant body whose chance of success is so good that they may fairly call upon all men who are not their enemies to stand aside and let them fight it out.

There is the simple proposition, clearly and forcibly stated, as to what "belligerent rights" meant, internationally speaking, which were accorded to the Confederate States by the United States. It was simply, so far as the outer world was concerned, "hurrah" for one and "well done" for the other. When the Prize Cases came up in 2 Black our Supreme Court got upon its high stilts and adjudicated this a public war—a war, so far as the world was concerned, as regarded between the United States and any independent power. They continued that as far as the case of Mrs. Alexander's cotton in the second volume of Wallace's Reports; but when we were drawing a long breath South and hoped we were going to be delivered at last upon that notion, in applying the doctrine to particular cases it was not enforced according to that theory. "Belligerent rights" were construed to mean something else, to mean what Phillips in his work says they mean, simply in transactions internationally as meaning nothing but "we will stand aside and permit you to fight it out."

When these statements were propounded to the commission at Geneva the representatives of those five governments there represented saw that it would never do for them to incorporate such a principle in international law as an encouragement to provinces and states to revolt, and they said, "We award you nothing further than the losses that actually occurred from the neutral failing to stand up and see a fair fight; we will not allow you to pay for your wounded honor or your wounded pride; we will not pay you for the prolongation of the war and the money you spent in hunting down these cruisers; the scales of justice are not broad enough and strong enough to weigh such considerations, and we will limit ourselves to the three rules and what we understand to be belligerent rights according to international law."

Upon this matter further on page 158 of Mr. Cushing's work where he attacks the decision of the tribunal upon this proposition, he says:

Now, the capture of private property on the seas, it cannot be denied, is one of the methods of public war. Whether such capture be made by letters of marque, or by regular men-of-war, is immaterial; in either form it increases the resources of one belligerent, and it weakens those of the other.

These are the national losses, or, as the British government insists, the indirect losses inflicted by neglect or omission to discharge the obligations of neutrality.

In deciding that such losses—that, in general, the national charges of war—cannot, by the law of nations, be regarded as "good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations," the tribunal in effect relegated that question to the unexplored field of the discretion of sovereign states.

My recollection is that when the Johnson-Clarendon treaty came before the Senate the great speech of Mr. Sumner was directed against it because it had not protected the very ideas which this commission excluded in their consideration of the matter, and which ideas were "relegated to the unexplored field of the discretion of sovereign states." That is to say, "You may war as much as you please, but we will not make them, the damages thereby done, the subject-matter of compensation"—or "computation of damages," as Mr. Cushing calls it—"between nations."

The arbitrators, assuming that, pursuant to the command of the treaty, they are to be governed by the three rules and the principles of international law not incompatible therewith, proceed to lay down the following prefatory positions, namely—

They have so often been used in the debate that I shall not repeat them. Then on page 164 Mr. Cushing says:

EFFECT OF THE AWARD.

In reflecting on this award, and seeking to determine its true construction, let us see, in the first place, what it actually expresses either by inclusion or exclusion.

The award is to the United States, in conformity with the letter of the treaty, which has for its well-defined object to remove and adjust complaints and claims "on the part of the United States."

But the history of the treaty and of the arbitration shows that the United States recover—recover, not for the benefit of the American Government as such, but of such individual citizens of the United States as shall appear to have suffered loss by the acts or neglects of the British government.

Now, mark this—

She does not recover as a government and for the government, but she recovers for her citizens, in her name as trustee for those citizens however obnoxious and objectionable the term may be to some gentleman.

It is, however, not a specific trust legally affected to any particular claim or claimants, but a general fund to be administered by the United States in good faith, in conformity with their own conceptions of justice and equity, within the range of the award.

The range of the award is small, its compass is diminutive indeed.

The tribunal does not afford us any rules of limitation affecting the distribution of the award, unless in the declaration that "prospective earnings," "double claims" for the same losses, and "claims for gross freights, so far as they exceed net freights," cannot properly be made the subject of compensation,—that is to say, as against Great Britain.

Nor does the tribunal define affirmatively what claims should be satisfied otherwise than in the comprehensive terms of the award, which declares that the sum awarded is "the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformably to the provisions contained in article VII of the aforesaid treaty."

We have seen what claims were preferred to the tribunal; first, four items of national losses, second, three items of private losses. They exclude in their decision everything except the direct losses for the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the three cruisers named and the four tenders of the two first. That is the language of Mr. Cushing who acted so important and so prominent a part in all these proceedings. The question now is what is "the range of the award."

Here let us go back a little further. After correspondence with our Government, Mr. Davis, the agent for the United States, said to this tribunal this:

The agent of the United States is authorized to say that consequently the above-mentioned claims—

That is those which were excluded—will not be further insisted on before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made.

There was an absolute abandonment by the agent of the United States, after corresponding with his Government, as to the claims which were excluded, and the president of this commission announced that as the decision final upon that subject.

Now, we have the finding of the commission; and let us retrace our steps to get fully at the private-losses question that came before the commission. How did these private losses come there? In what way? On the 25th of October, 1862, Mr. Secretary Seward sends to Mr. Minister Adams papers to be laid before Earl Russell as to depredations of piratical vessels built in British ports, and says:

The President wishes them laid before Earl Russell in order to obtain redress for national and private losses or injuries sustained.

That is the first step; that is the beginning of the presentation of private claims, which is done by the Secretary of State of this Government.

In February, 1863, Mr. Seward sends to Mr. Adams a memorial of the New York Mutual Insurance Company for losses sustained by depredations; and on the 19th of February Mr. Adams laid them before Earl Russell. September 22, 1865, the State Department published a circular showing how private claims were to be made out and offering to present those claims. In September, 1871, the same Department says it will present all such claims to the arbitrators.

Mr. President, what was the purpose of that? What was the purpose of publishing a circular to the world showing exactly the form of procedure by which the claims were to be presented to the tribunal at Geneva, unless it was in order to collect them for the claimants? "The national losses are ruled out now, but we accord so much for these private losses or the losses of the Government and private persons holding property in some destroyed vessel or destroyed cargo," says the Geneva tribunal.

That is not all. December 5, 1870, the then President of the United States, General Grant, in his message to Congress advised the settling of these claims by the United States, so that the Government might own and control them. If the argument of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] be good, the Government now owns them and always did own them; they belong to the Government absolutely; but here is the Chief Executive recommending that the Government buy them. Although it is said by the Senator from Vermont he was not a great constitutional lawyer, yet he was surrounded and advised and influenced by great constitutional lawyers and great publicists of the day, who would compare with those of any country, and he advised Congress that they should settle these claims in order that the Government might control them.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to ask him if Congress did not take the opposite view and refuse to comply with the request?

Mr. GARLAND. That is very probably true, but that does not affect the question at all, so far as I can see. Those may have been the views of Congress. We are now discussing the character of these claims as recognized in the light of history at that time when they were being presented to the tribunal for consideration and what character the tribunal itself put upon them.

The letter of Mr. Fish, of December 8, 1871, to our counsel at Geneva as to committing the Government against any allowances was his own private act, in order to have the distribution free and open here in this country, because he says there may be duplicate claims presented there and they had better come here, where the proof can be had readily, to dispose of the fund.

But the tribunal made its award. According to the ordinary action of arbitrations, they split the difference and gave a sum in gross for the private losses, including the Government losses, where the Government had any proprietary interest in ships and cargoes that were destroyed by the inculpated cruisers. The commission did this for what reason? Because they did not desire to make themselves a mere board of assessors, which they could have done under the treaty, or a mere board of auditors to compute accounts and render judgment separately on each case. They awarded a sum to this Government, saying that upon this character of losses we find in gross so much, which shall settle all these claims, and if the United States is not satisfied with that she "must be relegated to that unexplored field of the discretion of sovereign States."

Then the fund comes here impressed with this character, and it is not in the power of human language to change it; and I do not know, so far as I am concerned, what better business the General Government can be at than protecting her individual citizens who pay her taxes and fight her battles for her. The Rustomjee case, from which I shall read in a few minutes, proceeds on the idea that because the Queen of England, (who, as some recent writer has said, is more for ornament than use anyhow,) in that complicated machinery, the British Government, is too dignified a person to pay the poor Chinaman who was the plaintiff the money to which he was entitled, because she cannot be sued, therefore the United States cannot be recognized as an agent or trustee to collect money for her citizens. As much stress has been laid on this case of Rustomjee, it will be almost amusing to see what little connection it has with this kind of transaction, and if there is anything to be deduced from it you can deduce the strongest kind of argument—I admit it is but a remote parallel—in favor of the position that the bill now before the Senate rests upon.

By a treaty between the Queen of England and the Emperor of China—

I read from first Queen's Bench Division, as it is termed, page 487—

By a treaty between the Queen of England and the Emperor of China, the Emperor agreed to pay to the British government the sum of $3,000,000 on account of debts due to British subjects from certain Chinese merchants, who had become insolvent, being largely indebted to British merchants. The money having been received by the British government—

Held, that a petition of right would not lie by one of the British merchants to obtain payment of a sum of money alleged to be due to him from one of the Chinese merchants.

And it is a wonder that any lawyer ever thought otherwise; but applied here what does it mean? It means simply that these claimants of this fund, these private losers, the owners, or those who paid them as for a total loss, the insurance companies, cannot possibly sue the United States, or the President if you run out the analogy. Of course that is so; but if it be true it is a stronger reason why Congress should come to the relief of these parties, and not seize this money and hold it from them because they cannot sue the Government. Between individuals that would be no less than robbery. Congress standing as the repository of the conscience of the nation, as equity will never suffer a trust to fail for the want of a trustee, must, holding this money in trust, establish a trustee to disburse the money. And it is not a happy thought at this day and time, this Government having been founded upon and for individual rights, to say that you will turn them away because they have no remedy. Governments less solicitous of the rights of their citizens than ours have provided ample remedies in their courts against themselves. I am not so sure but what Brownson was correct when he said the difference between a barbarian government and a republic was that in a republic the public wealth, the common wealth, that is the government, was a trust for the public, for all the people, and a barbarian government was held by the officers for their own benefit regardless of the people, and that the distinction did not lie between a barbarian government and a republican government in the mere advancement of arts and sciences, &c.

I am not willing to write myself down for one as consenting to the doctrine that this Government affords no protection to these people simply because they have not a strictly legal right or a technical legal remedy. Now let me read a little of the language of the judges in the case of Rustomjee:

The notion that the Queen of this country in receiving a sum of money in order to do justice to some of her subjects, to whom injustice would otherwise be done, becomes the agent of those subjects seems to me really too wild a notion to require a single word of observation beyond that of emphatically condemning it.

That will do for that country.

In like manner to say that the sovereign becomes the trustee for subjects on whose behalf money has been received by the Crown appears to be equally untenable.

That is the language of the chief-justice. The other judges, Blackburn and Lush, both follow in the same strain in disposing of the case and giving their views upon it. But pray tell me what application that case has here? Has not your Congress established a Court of Claims in which individuals can sue the Government? Is not the Government the agent of the captured and abandoned property fund for people entitled to it? It will not do in this day and time to shelter ourselves behind the idea that this Government cannot become an agent, a trustee.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? Do I understand that either of the members of the committee of which the honorable Senator is part insist that it is not obligatory upon the Government of the United States to distribute this fund among some of the various claimants who have set up claims to it?

Mr. GARLAND. I do not understand that to be asserted.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The question then I understand to be as to the power of the Government to distribute the fund between these claimants.

Mr. GARLAND. I understand that some members of the committee, a part of the committee, repudiated the idea that this fund comes here charging a trust on the part of this Government. That is the point I am now trying to analyze, if I can.

I shall read no more from the Rustomjee case. The Senate understands it. It is based upon ideas and theories (and the very language used shows it) of a government resting upon different principles and different ideas from ours; ideas which were exploded and rooted out forever in the very formation and beginning of anything like government on the territory of this country.

This fund comes charged in this way, for the private losers of vessels and cargoes, either the original owners or the persons who paid as insurers as for a total loss; and if the Government repudiates that obligation through any legislation of Congress, she might just as well say she will never sue on a marshal's bond for the benefit of Smith, Brown, or anybody else. She is a trustee, an agent, when she brings her suit and permits her name to be used for the recovery of money against any of her officers on a bond. When she permits her name to be used to cancel a patent alleged to have been illegally issued she becomes the agent and trustee of the person for whose benefit she sues.

The next question is, according to the theory of the bill before us, are the insurance companies who paid as for a total loss entitled to participate in this fund? The Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] I think, made that so clear that it is not necessary for me to do more than refer to it, and I will not detain the Senate upon that proposition. I beg leave, however, to read from 2 Parsons, on marine insurance:

It is a universal rule, that all rights, claims, and interests, which are indissolubly connected with the property insured, pass to the insurers by an abandonment of the property, so far as the same belonged to the assured and to the extent of the interest covered by the policy; as right to contribution for general average; all claims for negligence or any misconduct causing injury to the property, as for collision, or for injury to goods; or for any indemnity from a foreign government. And the same rule applies where the government of the country to which the parties belong grants letters of reprisal to obtain satisfaction from a foreign government for illegal captures; the underwriters who have paid for losses occasioned by such captures are entitled to the benefit of the fund accruing from the reprisals.

That is note 5. In note 4 reference is made to the cases of—

Comegys vs. Vasse, 1 Pet., 193; Russell vs. Union Ins. Co., 4 Dall., 421, per Washington, J.; Gracie vs. New York Ins. Co., 8 Johns., 237. And in Rogers vs. Hosack, 18 Wend., 319, it was held that the spes recuperandi passed by the abandonment, although the loss had not been actually paid by the underwriters.

Note 5 refers to—

Randal vs. Cockran, 1 Ves. Sen., 98.

And all those cases which the Senator from Illinois discussed when he had the floor.

I read next from page 494 of the same volume; I prefer to read from a commentary, because the author comments on the decided cases in the notes, which Senators can refer to if they desire:

As the insurers not only acquire by abandonment all the interests in the subject-matter of the insured, but all his rights of action connected with it, so the insured must concur in whatever measures are necessary to the full benefit and advantage of the interests and rights transferred to him. They may use his name in all actions where it is necessary, and may claim whatever compensation or contribution the insured could claim against other persons. And as the insurers become owners of the property abandoned to them, they have all the actions and remedies of an owner for any torts, as barratry or others, committed after their ownership began.

Various authorities to this point are here cited. And to the same extent also is the opinion of Attorney-General Hoar, (13 Opinions, p. 182); and indeed there is no opinion to the contrary.

The result is simply this, nothing more, that the insurers became, as the civil law expresses it—which doctrine we have incorporated in our own system of equity jurisprudence without dotting an i or crossing a t, or making any change at all—subrogated to the rights of the original owners, and that subrogation carries the right to the particular thing as well as all other rights necessary to enforce that right.

I read next from Dixon on Subrogation, page 151:

The right of subrogation exists in favor of an insurer who has been subjected to liability and made payment on a policy of insurance, on the happening of the loss, to all actions against the person by whose negligence or wrong the loss was caused.

In a case before the King's Bench, Lord Mansfield said: "Every day the insurer is put in the place of the insured. In every abandonment it is so. The insurer uses the name of the insured."

Referring to this case of Mason vs. Sainsbury, 3 Douglas, page 63, and commenting on that, the author goes on to say:

"When such an equity exists," said the court, "the party holding the legal right is conscientiously bound to make an assignment, in equity, to the person entitled to the benefit; and if he fails to do so, the cestui que trust may sue in the name of the trustee, and his equitable interest will be protected. In regard to the right of the insurance company to sue in the name of the assured, we think the cases fully affirm the position, that by accepting payment of the insurers the assured do implicitly assign their right of indemnity from a party liable to the assured. It is in the nature of an equitable assignment, which authorizes the assignee to sue in the name of the assignor for his own benefit; and this is a right which a court of law will support and will restrain and prohibit the assignor from defeating it by a release." It is observable that the court fully sustains the doctrine of subrogation by operation of law.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the honorable Senator permit me to ask him a question in connection with that proposition? It is whether if any of those destroyed vessels had been taken into a confederate port, and, according to the course of the admiralty in a prize court of the confederacy, had been condemned and sold for value instead of having been burned, the honorable Senator thinks in that case the right of subrogation would have attached?

Mr. GARLAND. Very early after the war the vice-chancellor of England, in a case where the United States Government was trying to get hold of money the confederacy had deposited in England for war purposes, held that the United States was some sort of an heir, he did not exactly say an heir at law, of the Confederate States, and took everything that actually belonged to the Confederate States over there. The particular proposition that the Senator from Florida puts forth is one that is controverted in law. My own opinion is that, according to the belligerent rights accorded in the doctrine of Phillips on Jurisprudence, it would not have changed the attitude one particle. However, as Sir Roger de Coverly, I believe, said, that is a subject on which gentlemen may very well differ. But we are discussing the case now in hand. We have an actual case here and not a supposed case; that is, that this fund has been procured in a certain way and after certain events that have transpired known to the history of the country, and it is not worth while to go out of the actual facts to bring in a case of supposition.

The fund has come to us with this character and with these legal limitations and restrictions surrounding it. The question is, shall the fund be disbursed according to this bill reported from the Judiciary Committee to the losers of these vessels and cargoes and those persons who paid insurance thereon? All other questions are ruled out of the case. That is the absolute law of the case. Of course the Senate can get around that; the Senate can avoid it; Congress may avoid it through prejudice or through caprice or through main strength and awkwardness, if you choose. That that is the law there cannot be the possibility of doubt. It is as plain in my judgment as any proposition ever enunciated to the mind of man, as plain as the fingers of my hand before me.

Will Congress execute this legal right, or will it set itself up to take in the unexplored field of charity or mercy to find some object worthy of the bestowal of this fund.

One Senator said some time since that these insurance companies had already gone into the Treasury up to their armpits. What in the name of common sense and in the name of Heaven has that to do with the legal right of the case? Another Senator said and other persons have said that the insurance companies made much money off these transactions. What has that to do with the legal proposition at the bottom of this case?

There may be an analogous response to that. The Senator from Vermont, who rests on that proposition to some extent, has his law library insured for $10,000, we will say. A fire burns up that law library. He makes his proof and applies for payment to the insurance company. Why, say the company, that is all right, but we give you a fee down here of $20,000, in one case in this section of the country; we give you another fee of $20,000 in another section; and $10,000 elsewhere—$50,000 in all; and you ought to be ashamed of yourself for asking for this compensation. What would be the response of the Senator from Vermont to that? The expression upon the countenance of Hamlet when he saw his father's ghost, would be composure compared with his. We have here simply a question of legal right. If you avoid the legal right, let me ask you who is entitled to this compensation any more than the persons who lost vessels and cargoes and the persons who paid for the losses according to the range of the award as Mr. Cushing has said? It is enough for Congress to know that this is what the law requires, and that is the guide at last for legislatures and courts. The ideas of mere charity or mercy, or morals, are varied and variant all the time. They are as numerous, they are as varied in the human bosom as the tints upon the rainbow. No, Senators, there is no fixed idea by which you can regulate them.

Here, then, are these losses provided for by this commission; losses of owners who have been paid by insurance companies who are subrogated to their claims. That is the whole of it. There is nothing else about it, notwithstanding all the volumes accompanying this Geneva award.

I have said that the Government of the United States presented to the British government and to the Geneva tribunal the claims of individuals. Indeed the individual losers could not present their claims except through their Government.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] read a statute showing that the citizen could do this only by and through his Government. Now he does it, and we are told that the Government cannot be a trustee; this is inconsistent if nothing more.

Mr. President, I have stated briefly the general features of this bill. If there is a surplus of the fund left it would be right and proper, I admit, to pay all persons, if you can get at them, in proper degree and proper manner, who suffered in consequence of the depredations of these cruisers. But pay those first who have a legal right. That, it seems to me, is the only proper way to enforce the finding of the commission. If it be true that this fund comes to us as a trust fund, as Mr. Cushing says, and charged and expressed in this way, it is our bounden duty under every consideration to execute that trust and disburse the money accordingly.

I wish to read to the Senate for a few moments some of the bright visions that Mr. Cushing conceived about the wonders that had been effected by this tribunal and some of the splendid hopes that he built upon its work notwithstanding he objected and he criticised with some severity the finding of the commission, as appears in the record. He says:

What, then, it may be asked, have the United States gained by the treaty of Washington, and by the arbitration?

We have gained the vindication of our rights as a government; the redress of the wrong done to our citizens; the political prestige in Europe and America, of the enforcement of our rights against the most powerful state of Christendom; the elevation of maxims of right and of justice into the judgment-seat of the world; the recognition of our theory and policy of neutrality by Great Britain; the honorable conclusion of a long-standing controversy and the extinction of a cause of war between Great Britain and the United States; and the moral authority of having accomplished these great objects without war, by peaceful means, by appeals to conscience and to reason through the arbitrament of a high international tribunal.

That war, the great curse and scourge of mankind, will utterly cease because of the present successful instance of international arbitration nobody pretends. Questions of national ambition or national resentment,—conflicts of dynastic interest,—schemes of territorial aggrandizement, nay, deeper causes, resting in superabundant population or other internal facts of malaise, misery, and discontent,—will continue to produce wars to the end of time.

We, Great Britain and the United States, have in this matter shown that even a question affecting, or supposed to affect, national honor, may be settled by arbitration; and if we have not effected the establishment of international arbitration as the universal substitute for war, we have co-operated to prove by our example that the largest possible questions between contending governments are susceptible of being settled by peaceful arbitration. As Lord Ripon truly says, in so doing we have taken a great step in the direction of the dearest of all earthly blessings, the blessing of peace.

We have seen that Mr. Cushing said in the early part of this work that this fund was awarded to us in trust for the benefit of claimants. We have seen what high hopes he built upon the work of the commission in the interest of peace in the civilized world. Now, I have to say that if this Congress or any other Congress disregards this arbitration, casts it aside and says that we will set up an arbitrary rule and distribute this fund as we see proper, outside of the compass of the award, these splendid visions and bright hopes are gone forever and we shall never have another international arbitration to settle disputes of this kind. If the bill is not correct upon its general principles, we have no right to this money at all and had better send it back to England, for we hold it under false pretenses, as it would be characterized among individuals.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I do not expect to say anything new upon this subject. I hope to make clear the reasons which will govern my vote. By the treaty of Washington the United States endeavored to obtain a redress of grievances against Great Britain. It was the nation which complained against the nation. The language of the treaty is explicit. It starts out with words which do not admit of doubt or misconception.

Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty, and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims":

Now, in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims, which are not admitted by Her Britannic Majesty's government, the high contracting parties agree that all the said claims growing out of acts committed by the aforesaid vessels, and generically known as the "Alabama claims," shall be referred to a tribunal of arbitration to be composed of five arbitrators, to be appointed in the following manner, that is to say, &c.

The "differences" are between the "governments." Out of these differences had grown "claims," but the treaty says that they were "claims on the part of the United States." "In order," says the treaty, "to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims," no others, was this arbitration entered into.

Now, what "claims" did the two nations thus negotiate over? They grew "out of the acts of several vessels," and are "generically known as the Alabama claims." Every "difference," "complaint," or "claim," therefore, growing out of the acts committed by the "several vessels" thus classed which the Government of the United States had or could properly make against the government of Great Britain were submitted to this arbitration.

The result was to be a "full, perfect, and final settlement of all the claims hereinbefore referred to." Of course as these were grievances, complaints and claims on the part of the United States, the United States could stipulate what should settle them. The claims of others, even of its own citizens, this Government could not settle without their consent. It might withhold its aid in their enforcement but it could not settle them. They would still exist, and every other means would remain open for their enforcement.

Now, these grievances, complaints, and claims on the part of the United States were manifold, but they were all embraced in a single formula.

THE FAILURE OF GREAT BRITAIN IN ITS DUTY TO THE UNITED STATES AS A NEUTRAL NATION.

In this alleged failure by Great Britain lay all "differences, complaints, and claims on the part of the United States" submitted by the two nations to arbitration.

If there had been no failure by Great Britain there could be no complaint by the United States, whatever injuries a citizen of the one may suffer at the hands of a subject of the other. A subject of Great Britain may sink the ship of a citizen of the United States on the ocean, or the citizen may rob the subject in the streets of New York, and so long as there is no failure of the duty which the one nation owes to the other each sufferer is remitted to the ordinary remedies for redress. It becomes plain, therefore, why this was a controversy between the nations and not between or on account of individuals.

The injuries suffered by the United States because of the failure in neutral duty on the part of Great Britain were various and widely differing in character. This failure had enabled subjects of Great Britain to fire upon the flag of the United States, to build, arm, and equip in the ports of Great Britain vessels of war for the use of those making war upon the United States, and to inflict upon a nation at peace with her other injuries in the destruction of the property of peaceable citizens upon the high seas entitled to the protection of the flag of their country. For all these injuries and many more following directly and indirectly from this failure of duty by the government of Great Britain the United States made "complaints," claimed redress. How was that redress to be secured? It might have been by war; but both nations preferred a higher and nobler method, that of peaceful arbitration.

It is obvious that many of these injuries thus inflicted by Great Britain on the United States could not be compensated in money. No one can calculate the money value of an insult to the flag. Nor could any one audit and add up in dollars and cents the equivalent of a breach of neutral obligations on the part of one nation toward another. So far as that breach works the destruction of the property of the private citizen which the nation was bound to protect, the measure of the loss is the value of the property destroyed. But the national grievance is not so measured. It may include the destruction of property, but is not measured by it. Security for the future is of infinitely more importance than indemnity for the past. Both were sought for by this arbitration.

But to obtain the largest possible security for the future the United States gave up much of the indemnity for the past originally claimed. This was competent, for it was the nation seeking its own redress as well as its own security in which are involved those of the citizens as well. Whether the United States gave up too much of past injury for future security gained, matters not to the question under discussion. As the "grievances," "complaints," and "claims," were all made by the United States upon Great Britain, it was entirely competent for it to give them all up for advantages in the future deemed an equivalent. How, when the security for the future had been attained at this cost, this nation shall treat those suffering citizens whose misfortunes have entered into the price of these attainments for the future, can safely be left to that sense of justice which ever pervades this nation.

At whose cost among its own citizens the nation has achieved the immeasurable good that will come to it from the Geneva award, the nation itself will not be slow to discern, nor will it hesitate to do them justice. This is its prerogative. The grievances of every kind belonged to the nation and so did the award. Those citizens who suffered in its attainment will be first taken care of. But bounties, largesses, and gains must come after indemnity.

Now, in order to obtain the advantages in the future of the three "new rules" governing neutral nations the United States was obliged in the submission itself to admit their application to past injuries, and thus deprive itself of a large part of its claim for pecuniary compensation. The nation deemed the "new rules" of more value to it than the money sacrificed to obtain them. That was for it to decide, and the people think the decision a wise one. But when the nation faces the citizen whose loss was thus turned to its great gain, quite other considerations should control the administration of justice to him.

Both governments so interpreted the treaty while the arbitration was pending and after it was concluded. While it was pending, and when it came well nigh to fall through from fear on the part of Great Britain lest the United States having got the three "new rules" which were hereafter to govern neutrals adopted, would still insist on a money indemnity for the indirect damages sustained, Mr. Schenck, representing our Government, writing to Earl Granville, representing the British government, expressly interpreted the treaty which he had himself helped make in accordance with the view of it here taken. These are his words:

In the conversation we had yesterday and which was resumed this morning, you stated to me that Her Majesty's government have always thought the language proposed by them in the draught article as it stands sufficient for the purpose of removing and putting an end to all demand on the part of the United States, in respect to those indirect claims which they put forth in their case at Geneva, and to the admissibility of which Her Majesty's government have objected, but that there were those who doubted whether the terms used, were explicit enough to make that perfectly clear, and to prevent those same claims from being put forward again.

I concurred with you in your view as to the sufficiency of the language used in that clause of the proposed article, and which the Government of the United States had accepted, and I repelled the idea that anybody should think it possible that the Government of the United States, if they should yield those claims for a consideration in a settlement between the two countries, would seek to bring them up in the future, or would insist that they were still before the arbitrators for their consideration. I am now authorized in a telegraphic dispatch received to-day from Mr. Fish, to say that the Government of the United States regards the new rule contained in the proposed article as the consideration for, and to be accepted as a final settlement of the three classes of the indirect claims put forth in the case of the United States to which the government of Great Britain have objected.

He indignantly repels the idea that the United States, having "yielded those claims for a consideration in a settlement between the two countries, would seek to bring them up in the future, or would insist that they were still before the arbitrators for their consideration." He goes further and quotes Mr. Fish as authority for saying that certain language our Government had offered for the purpose of removing a doubt which in his mind never existed, "as the consideration for and to be accepted as a final settlement of the three classes of indirect claims."

There never ought to have been a doubt entertained after these two authoritative statements by our Government to that of Great Britain pending the arbitration that our Government, for what was deemed by it a sufficient consideration, gained by itself, had by its own strong hand and for its own future profit settled and barred the very claims now before Congress called the war premiums. How can it be said that the Government had settled and barred the claim of a citizen who was no party to the proceeding? Did it mean to take away any private remedy which the citizen might have upon any person who had directly or indirectly inflicted an injury which could be redressed in money?

I take it not. That remedy exists to-day for what it is worth, the treaty notwithstanding. But the treaty did "settle and bar" all claim the United States could have on Great Britain for that breach of neutrality which resulted in those injuries. And the citizen could never afterward seek redress, if entitled to any, from the British government through our Government. Our Government had received its consideration for all such claims, and had agreed that that consideration so received by it should be their settlement. Thenceforth it had only to deal with its own citizens on principles of justice.

What shall be the measure of justice, and how and to whom it was to be meted out, Congress, who could alone speak for the Government, was to be expressly left without trammel or limitation. Mr. Fish expressly instructed the counsel at Geneva:

In the discussion of this question and in the treatment of the entire case you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded or what may be recovered in the event of the appointment of the board of assessors mentioned in the tenth article of the treaty. It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured.

The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the right and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without commitment as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such commitment will be avoided in the argument of counsel.

The form of the award discloses that the arbitrators themselves so understood the treaty under which they were acting:

The tribunal * * * awards to the United States the sum of $15,500,000 in gold as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the tribunal, &c.

Mr. Gladstone defended the treaty in Parliament after the award was made upon the same ground. He there said:

No claims of individuals have been submitted to arbitration in relation to the Alabama. What was submitted to arbitration was entirely a question between the two governments.

Mr. Cushing, leading counsel for the United States at Geneva, when he came home wrote a book upon the proceedings there, putting the award on the same ground:

The award is to the United States in conformity with the letter of the treaty, which has for its well-defined object to remove and adjust complaints and claims "on the part of the United States." But the history of the treaty and of the arbitration shows that the United States recover not for the benefit of the American Government as such, but of such individual citizens of the United States as shall appear to have suffered loss by the acts or neglects of the British government. It is, however, not a special trust legally affected to any particular claim or claimants, but a general fund to be administered by the United States in good faith in conformity with their own conceptions of justice and equity, within the range of the award.

After the award was paid, Congress created a tribunal to distribute it and asserted the power of directing to what class of sufferers it should be paid. The Government has paid the decrees of that tribunal, and thereby approved the principles of its action. Those principles are broad enough to cover the undistributed balance of the award, now amounting to more than $10,000,000. If they were sound as to part of it they are sound as to all of it. These are the principles laid down by that court as governing and controlling the distribution of this award. In one case they say:

Has he [the petitioner] such a right? He had a right of property in the ship which the Alabama destroyed, and he lost it without any act on the part of the Government of the United States which could give him redress against it. The Government of the United States was not obliged to claim from Great Britain payment of the loss, but acted in that regard according to its sovereign pleasure. It did not succeed in obtaining payment of the whole of the claims presented, and the most careful investigation of the proceedings at Geneva has failed to show what claims were included in the award and what excluded therefrom. The award was made in favor of the Government and not in favor of the claimants. The Government thus vindicated the national honor, but it did not assume to pay any particular class of claimants nor any particular claim. Having obtained the money by its own act and at its own cost, it had the right to prescribe the terms on which the distribution should be made. It certainly had the power to exclude certain claimants and to include others more meritorious.

In another they go further:

The reclamation made upon Great Britain was made by our Government in its capacity of sovereign, and not as a mere representative of private interests, and the indemnity received has been paid to the United States as a government. The fund is now in the Treasury entirely under the control of Congress, invested as directed by Congress, and was so when the act constituting this court was passed. Congress might have refused to pass any act providing for the indemnification of citizens; it might have retained the whole fund; it did appropriate such part of the funds as it judged just and right to be distributed among certain classes of claimants therefor. After the payment of the amount of our judgments, as provided by law, it may still retain the balance remaining, or it may provide for a further distribution among other classes of claimants. But in so doing it will dispose of its own; of money held in the Treasury of the Government free from all restraints except those which ought to influence any sovereign power, under the circumstances.

Thus it appears that the language of the treaty itself, the construction put upon it by those who assisted in making it while representing our Government pending the arbitration, the instructions by our Government to counsel and their argument before the tribunal, the language of the award, the statement of the leading counsel since his return, the statement in Parliament by the prime minister who bound England to the treaty, and the avowed principles upon which the award has been in part distributed by a court created for that purpose by act of Congress, all agree that this was an arbitration between nations of claims made by one nation upon another for indemnity for injuries suffered by that nation from a failure in its duty by the other; that the nation sought for and obtained great gain and security for the future by the sacrifice of a large part of the claim it could otherwise have made in money; that the money result of the arbitration thus obtained, the nation declared beforehand it would only receive and it did receive it "without commitment as to the mode of distribution" and "free from all restraints except those which ought to influence any sovereign power under the circumstances."

The highest court of England in the oft-quoted case of Rustomjee vs. The Queen, a case of their own, arising since the Alabama award, has announced the same principle. It was a much stronger case than ours, for there was nothing but money treated of in that case, "debts due to British subjects from certain Chinese merchants who had become insolvent."

By treaty between the Queen of England and the Emperor of China the Emperor agreed to pay and did pay to the British government $3,000,000 on account of those debts, and Rustomjee, one of the creditors, brought his action for his share of it, claiming that it had been received for his use. The case was decided against him in all the courts on the ground that the money was received by the sovereign to be distributed solely according to her sense of justice. The court of appeals used this language:

We assent, upon full consideration, to the reasoning of the judges in the court below. The making of peace and the making of war, as they are the undoubted so they are, perhaps, the highest acts of the prerogative of the Crown. The terms on which peace is made are in the absolute discretion of the sovereign. If Captain Elliott did (to use the words of the petitioner) promise that the Queen would compel the Chinese government to pay these claims when terms of peace were arranged, if Sir Henry Pottinger did promise that these claims should be insisted on and should be paid, they both exceeded their authority, and promised what they had no power to perform or to pledge the Queen to perform. The Queen might or not, as she thought fit, have made peace at all; she might or not, as she thought fit, have insisted on this money being paid her. * * * We do not say that under no circumstances can the Crown be a trustee; we do not even say that under no circumstances can the Crown be an agent; but it seems clear to us that in all that relates to the making and performance of a treaty with another sovereign the Crown is not, and cannot be, either a trustee or an agent for any subject whatever.

We do not, indeed, doubt that on the payment of the money by the Emperor of China there was a duty on the part of the English sovereign to administer the money so received according to the stipulations of the treaty, but it was a duty to do justice to her subjects according to the advice of her responsible minister; not the duty of an agent to a principal, or of a trustee to a cestui que trust.

The London Times saw more clearly than do some Senators the application of these principles to the distribution of the Geneva award, for, commenting on this case editorially, that paper said:

Similar principles, in different terms, would apply to such an indemnity as we paid to the United States, and it would follow, therefore, that the money was paid to the Government of the United States, not in the mere capacity of a trustee for individuals, but as the sovereign authority of the nation. * * * Congress, accordingly, is perfectly within its competence in considering how the surplus shall be appropriated.

I cannot, Mr. President, resist the conclusion to which I am thus led, that the Geneva award belongs to the United States, and no citizen can maintain a claim of right to it, and that a broad and high sense of equity and justice to all who suffered by England's fault should alone govern its distribution. It was awarded to us as indemnity; it should be distributed as indemnity. There can be no indemnity where there has been no loss. Before no just tribunal can he claim indemnity who has suffered no loss. The insurance companies can have no standing in such a court, for they made great gains, not losses, out of the very fault of England for which she paid this indemnity to the United States, and the longer she persisted in that fault the more enormous were their gains. They trafficked in this neglect of England for which she paid the money. And now they want the money in addition to the great gains that traffic yielded. They took the blood and demand the blood-money too.

The real nature of the business upon which these insurance companies entered and upon which they base their claim to this money, by subrogation to the rights of the insured, and which resulted in such enormous gains, is so clearly stated by the London Times in the editorial already alluded to that I venture to quote it:

Where a ship was fully insured, of course the owners received their compensation at the time from the underwriters, and they cannot be paid over again. But the underwriters also received their compensation, for they insured the vessel at war risks; and the additional premium, not merely on the particular ship which was lost, but on the numerous other ships insured on the same favorable terms, must be regarded as having secured them against loss. They agreed, in fact, for the payment of certain premiums, to run the risk of the very disaster which happened to any such vessel, and they must, therefore, be regarded as having insured themselves against the consequences. To pay further compensation to them would, in this instance, also be paying them twice over.

What a perversion of the language of the award this would be!

The tribunal award to the United States the sum of $15,500,000 in gold as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the tribunal.

If the insurance companies are to add this money to the gains they made out of England's violation of neutrality, how misspent were the energies of counsel at Geneva reported by Mr. Davis to his Government when the result was attained! This is what they thought they were doing:

We devoted our energies toward securing such a sum as should be practically an indemnity to the sufferers. Whether we have or have not been successful can be determined only by the final division of the sum.

Nobody can mistake who the sufferers are. And nothing can be more true than that the final distribution here spoken of, to be determined by Congress, will also determine in precisely the manner here indicated whether those who labored at Geneva "have or have not been successful." If these sufferers, whoever they may be, shall be indemnified, they will have achieved a success. But if the insurance companies shall be permitted to add this money to the gains they made out of war risks, then will the counsel at Geneva have achieved a signal failure and the nation a lasting reproach.

Whoever has suffered a loss by the default of England in regard to her duty as a neutral, whether that loss was given up by his Government "in consideration" of gains to itself in the future, or whether that loss entered into the money calculation of the arbitrators in addition to security for the future thus purchased with it, such sufferer has a claim upon the balance of this award before all others.

I can find no basis for the claim of the insurance companies beyond the actual loss by them sustained in their business. They claim to be subrogated to all the rights of the insured whose losses they have paid, and insist they are entitled, in the shoes of such insured, to enforce such rights for their own use. But if there is any truth in what has been said, no citizen has any right to this fund. It was paid to the United States, and is to be distributed by the United States according to its sense of justice, "without committal as to the mode of distribution," and "in conformity with their own conceptions of justice and equity within the range of the award."

If, then, no individual has any right to this money, then the insurance companies can be subrogated to none. Besides, the money was paid by England for its own default as a neutral. The insurance companies did not insure against that default, but against the destruction of the vessels by rebel cruisers. That destruction was one of the consequences of that default, but not the default itself. So the destruction insured against was one thing, and the default as a neutral another broader and far more comprehensive thing, for which England expressed her regret, conceded the "new rules," and paid the money.

In addition to all this, the insured could not themselves have recovered anything of the cruisers which destroyed their ships; for the destruction itself was an act of war, for which the citizen who suffers has no remedy. An action might as well have been maintained against the commander of the Army of the Potomac by the citizen whose grain had been trodden out and destroyed in the march to Richmond. The claims of the insurance companies seem, therefore, to me as baseless in law as in justice. I shall therefore support that bill which calls into the court of distribution only those and all those who are actual sufferers from the default of England—those who lost by the cruisers "exculpated" by the "new rules," and those compelled to pay enhanced premiums because of the presence on the ocean of confederate steamers, put afloat through British negligence.

Mr. KERNAN obtained the floor.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the Senator yield for an executive session?

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 23, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. DAVID WILLS, D. D., of Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

AMENDMENT OF JOURNAL.

Mr. CONGER. I find on page 24 of the RECORD of this morning, under the head "Amendment of Revised Statutes," a bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to revise and amend sections 2503, 2504, and 2505 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which sections, by looking at the Revised Statutes, it will be found embrace thirty pages—the entire tariff laws of the United States, as to the classification of articles. It appears that the reference of the bill, instead of being made to the Committee on Ways and Means, as it ought to have been, was by some mistake, as I think, made to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. The Chair has ruled on that so often—

The SPEAKER. The House has ruled on it. The Chair has not ruled.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair has ruled that matters relating to the tariff go to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submitted that question and the House acted on it.

Mr. CONGER. The House did not act on this reference yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The House did not in this instance, although it witnessed the reference.

Mr. CONGER. As I have frequently stated to the Chair, the Chair uniformly assenting, the trouble is that bills are sometimes introduced, entitled bills to amend certain statutes, mentioning their number, without saying to what subjects they relate. The referring of a bill in this way to a committee without anybody, the Chair or anybody else, knowing what the subject-matter was I have frequently stated was not the better way at least of introducing bills.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. There is no proposition, so far as I know, before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to listen to a gentleman who states that a bill has been improperly referred.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What motion does the gentleman from Michigan make?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not yet know.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to any debate unless there is a proposition before the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to correct the Journal, so that the bill shall be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CONGER. That was the proposition I was about to make.

Mr. MILLS. Is it intended to move to correct the Journal by putting upon it a false statement?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio may move to amend the Journal; but the Chair thinks the Journal is correct. It is impossible for the Chair to know what is embraced in a bill which in its title only alludes to certain sections of the Revised Statutes by their number.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to say a word.

Mr. CONGER. I had not finished my remarks.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am willing to hear what the gentleman has to say further, but I shall desire to say something in reply.

Mr. CONGER. I was proceeding to state that this point has been frequently brought to the attention of the House before, and the Chair has said from his place heretofore that it would be proper that a bill should state the subject to which it relates, so that both the Chair and members of the House might see it had the proper reference. This bill had not a proper statement of its subject in its title.

The SPEAKER. It had not, except by reference to the numbers of certain sections of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. CONGER. And I wish to say, while I desire to cast no reflection on the Chair—of course the Chair could not tell any more than any member what was in that bill—while the rule as it would be enforced by the Chair, unless the House ordered otherwise, would take this bill evidently and unquestionably to the Committee on Ways and Means, yet the lack of any statement in the title of the matter to which the bill related of course left the Chair or any member unable at the time to know what the reference should be; but the rule should execute itself; and when a bill is introduced in that way, and wrongly referred, if upon knowing the subject-matter of it the Chair would have referred it under the rule to a committee or else have submitted the question of its reference to the House, then the correction should be made when the Journal is read next morning. I do not say it needs any motion. I do not say that would be the proper way. I am merely submitting this proposition to the Speaker in regard to this bill or any other whether when it appears there has been an improper reference—the Chair having the control of the Journal—whether it is not competent for the Chair to correct the reference?

The SPEAKER. The Journal is correct.

Mr. CONGER. It is not correct under the rule. The reference was not made under the rule.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to be heard on this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will listen to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. When the House proceeded to the call of States yesterday for the introduction of bills, and the State of Illinois was called, I rose from my seat and in the open House, as I had a right to do as a member from that State, offered the bill of which the gentleman from Michigan has been speaking. The bill in its title clearly discloses what its purpose was. It was to revise and amend the sections mentioned in title 33 of the Revised Statutes. That bill, sir, in open House, without objection from any quarter, was referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws, in my judgment a proper committee, under the rules of the House, for its consideration.

I have no doubt that those who are opposed to a revision of the tariff could easily have called to mind what that bill was aimed at when the Clerk, in a clear, loud, and distinct voice, read to this House that it was "A bill to revise and amend sections 2503, 2504, and 2505 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes." The bill was properly introduced, it has been properly referred, and is now properly before the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. No mistake was made by me, and I am satisfied no gentlemen here can accuse any one in this House of having made a mistake in the matter.

And so far as the question is concerned of reconsidering the reference, I wish to say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that the Chair, on yesterday, made a ruling clear and distinct, and capable of no misunderstanding whatever. I will read that ruling. When a certain joint resolution had been introduced, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. KING] moved to reconsider the reference, so that the joint resolution might be referred to the Committee on the Inter-oceanic Ship Canal. The Speaker of this House refused to entertain the motion. This is his language:

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not entertain the motion to reconsider. He thinks that bills and resolutions introduced under this call cannot come back upon a motion to reconsider, and should not be subject to a motion to reconsider.

The Chair then directed the Clerk to read from clause 2 of Rule XVIII, the following:

No bill, petition, memorial, or resolution referred to a committee, or reported therefrom for printing and recommitment, shall be brought back into the House on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that that is still his judgment, and that this matter cannot be reached by a reconsideration.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Very well, that is all I want.

Mr. REED. I certainly hope that there may be some way to reach this matter. We come here every Monday for the purpose of presenting bills and joint resolutions for printing and reference, and it is to be presumed that every member will have the bill he presents referred to an appropriate and suitable committee. Everybody in this House knows that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws—

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My point of order is that the gentleman from Maine is discussing a question which the Chair has decided, and which is already disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided that this matter cannot be reached by a motion to reconsider, because the Chair holds now as he did yesterday that a motion to reconsider the reference of a bill introduced on Monday is not admissible.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to ask a question of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I would like the Chair to tell this House what remedy any committee of this House may have, when by inadvertence a bill which should properly go to that committee has been improperly referred to another committee? If a bill giving in its title simply the number of a section of the Revised Statutes, which it proposes to amend or change, is referred by inadvertence to the wrong committee, is there any remedy?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Allow me to state to the gentleman from New York that this bill was not referred by inadvertence.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I am speaking to the Chair, not to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has made a motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. My motion is to amend the Journal.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman said that he moved to correct the Journal.

Mr. GARFIELD. If so, then I change my motion and move to amend the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has been recognized by the Chair as being entitled to the floor.

Mr. REED. I say that I sincerely hope that some way out of this difficulty may be found. Here seems to be a proposition referred to a committee, which committee every man in this House must recognize to be one to which that proposition would not have been referred had the House been possessed of a knowledge of the subject of the bill so referred. It seems to me that as a matter of good faith among members this thing should not be permitted, if the House can in any way prevent it.

In regard to this very class of bills or propositions the House has two or three times discussed the matter and determined it by an overwhelming majority. I do not purpose to say that this matter was smuggled in this way, nor do I purpose to use any offensive language in regard to it, because that would not be parliamentary; but it does seem to me to be perfectly plain, from the way in which the matter was brought in, without the House having any knowledge of the subject of it, what was the purpose and object of it.

Now, this ought not to be, and there should be some suitable and proper way of remedying it. It seems to me that every member ought to act with some special reference to the rules of the House, or when he does not do so, he should at least call the attention of the House to the fact that he is not doing so.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to reply. I have already stated that this bill was introduced in my right as a member of this House, and that it was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. I was glad to hear the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] say that he did not desire to say this bill was smuggled into the House; for if he had used such a term, parliamentary or unparliamentary, I should have denounced it upon my personal responsibility as willfully false.

A MEMBER. He ought to have used that term.

Mr. REED. And I should have replied that it would not make the slightest difference to me or any other member of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It might not make any difference to the gentleman to have been accused of falsehood; but men of honor would know the meaning of the word, and it would make a difference to them.

Mr. WILBER. I wish to ask the gentleman one question. When he introduced this bill, why did he not have it referred to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Because I believed that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws had jurisdiction over it, and that it would be a better committee for the interests of the people to consider that bill than the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. WILBER. One other question. Does the gentleman think that if the House had known the substance of the bill it would have consented to that reference?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has moved to amend the Journal. The gentleman will state in what manner.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word. The Journal of the House carries with it the authoritative orders of the House. The language of the Journal is within the power of the House as to what it shall be. I move that our Journal be so amended that its authoritative language shall declare that this bill goes to the Committee on Ways and Means. When that declaration is made, it goes there.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say, nevertheless, that the Journal is correct.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am not raising that question. I do not, blame the Chair or the journal clerk, for each of these officers has done his duty. The plain fact of this case (and I measure very carefully what I say) is this: every man on this floor knows that there are at least one hundred and forty members every one of whom would have objected to the proposed reference of the bill had its purpose been known.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Was it not read by the Clerk?

Mr. GARFIELD. And because members did not know its purpose, because they assumed that bills introduced under the call of Monday were introduced and referred in accordance with the rules, because of the general good faith that we exercise toward each other, the reading of the bill was not demanded. A manifestly improper reference, improper in the judgment of this House, was made; and our only direct means of correcting it is by such a motion as I have made.

Mr. CARLISLE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question—not so much with reference to this particular matter as with regard to the general practice of the House. It is admitted, I believe, on all sides that the Journal as it records the proceedings of yesterday with reference to this bill is absolutely correct. Now, if it be competent in this instance to change that Journal upon a motion to amend it, will it not be equally competent in any other instance to change it upon a motion to amend it?

The SPEAKER. That, however, is a question for the House.

Mr. CARLISLE. If, for instance, a bill voted on yesterday in this House had been rejected, and if the proceedings upon that bill had been recorded correctly in our Journal, would it be competent for a gentleman on the floor of the House, upon the reading of the Journal this morning, to move to amend it so as to show that the bill did not pass?

The SPEAKER. Does not the gentleman think it is within the power of a member to move to amend or correct the Journal?

Mr. MILLS. Not so as to make it state a falsehood.

Mr. CARLISLE. Not when it changes the result of the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House is the custodian of its own Journal and can make it read as it pleases. I move to make it read as I have suggested.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to say a word in relation to the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] If the reference of a bill which has been referred under the rules of the House, and the reference correctly recorded in the Journal, can be changed upon a motion to amend the Journal, this is but another mode of reconsidering that reference. In this case the bill having been openly and fairly introduced, read, and referred, and a motion not being admissible to reconsider the reference in order to bring the bill again before the House, the proposition is made to overcome the difficulty by a motion to correct the Journal so as to change the reference as correctly recorded. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio involves simply a method of reconsidering the formal legal act of this House, and in my judgment cannot be entertained. On the other point, while it may be the Committee on Ways and Means may have the right to consider questions of this kind, if it so happens that this House can get no relief from the existing condition of things by the agency of that committee and a bill is fairly put before another committee by which we may hope to get some action, it is for the House to maintain the action of the House in its own interests and the interest of the public.

Mr. MILLS. The Constitution of the United States requires each House to keep a journal of its proceedings. It requires each House to make a correct statement of what is done in the House; and it is not in the power of this House to destroy that record when it is made without in the same act destroying to that extent the Constitution. I remember reading the discussion on the celebrated expunging resolution when General Jackson was censured for his conduct at New Orleans, while a military commander at that post in the war of 1812. I remember the democratic party when they came into power desired to expunge from the record the vote of censure which had been placed upon him in the Senate; but after that matter was thoroughly discussed the ablest men in the Senate on the democratic side admitted that body had no power to mar that record, and the conclusion of the whole matter was that they drew black lines around the order of censure voted upon him by the Senate, and wrote in the margin of the Journal that that was expunged by order of the Senate. And, sir, that record stands to-day. The record which was made by the Senate of the United States voting a censure upon General Jackson stands to-day as a part of the record of the United States.

I admit, sir, we have the power to correct a mistake; and the Journal and the RECORD when they recite a fact that did not occur—we have a right to compel them, in obedience to the Constitution, to recite that fact as it did occur. But have we the right, have we the moral power or the legal power, to make our record recite a falsehood? The records have no moral power; they cannot state a falsehood.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from Texas permit me a word? I submit this is not a record until it has been approved by the House.

Mr. MILLS. It is a record of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. REED. It is not a record until it is approved to-day.

Mr. MILLS. That the Chair has decided: that you cannot get the control of it even by a motion to reconsider. It has passed from your jurisdiction. It is the record of the transactions of this House, and the motion now is to make your record recite a falsehood, to recite things which did not occur, and to impart to the record the moral responsibility which attaches to the man to make the record recite a falsehood. There can be no moral accountability in that inanimate object on your desk, but there is a moral accountability in the bosom of every man who regards the truth, that he ought not to tell a lie himself or make another do it.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to know whether it is competent to move to discharge the Committee on the Revision of the Laws from the further consideration of the subject?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Journal is before the House for approval.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. This bill was yesterday, by order of the House, referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. Would the Chair hold that a motion to reconsider the action of the House in that regard to-day was in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated on yesterday he would not. He made then a decision on that point.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And, sir, it is in the light of that decision I now ask this question: Whether it would be in order for a member of this House to-day to move to reconsider the action of the House in the reference of this bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws? How is it competent to attain the very same identical end by moving, not to reconsider, but to amend the Journal? Is it in order to move to amend a journal, which no man on this floor dares to say is not exactly correct? Is there a single statement made here in that Journal as read from that Clerk's desk this morning that any member of this House dares to impeach or impugn? If that Journal be correct, where can you find any warrant for a motion to move its amendment?

The SPEAKER. Under the parliamentary rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir. Will the chairman ex officio of the Committee on Rules, now Speaker of this House, undertake to say it ever was the intent or purpose of that rule, or any other rule that ever was adopted by any deliberative body on earth, to allow a motion to amend a thing which the mover of the motion admits himself does not permit amendment? If the Journal be correct there is no amendment that can be made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The Journal is correct.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I will submit to the Chair—I will not undertake to characterize the effort that is being made by the submission of the motion by the gentleman from Ohio—but I will undertake to speak of the results and challenge contradiction. There is no result to follow the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, except by indirection, to accomplish what the Chair has already ruled he has no right to do by methods of direction. This is not a natural method to pursue. The gentleman from Ohio sees in the ruling of the Chair yesterday that he is very properly precluded from the motion to reconsider the action of the House, deliberately taken, in sending the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois to the Committee on Revision of the Laws. Now, unable to get over that ruling and that action of the House, he seeks by a motion unknown, and I undertake to say never before submitted to any parliamentary or deliberative body on earth, and by a process of indirection, to accomplish that which under the rule, as carefully construed, he has not the right to reach.

Mr. HAYES. I would like to ask a single question.

The SPEAKER. This is a simple question, so far as the Chair is concerned.

Mr. HAYES. I want to ask is not the Journal as it stands now correct? Does it not record the proceedings of yesterday accurately and exactly as they occurred?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has anticipated the statement of the gentleman from Illinois on that point.

Mr. HAYES. If this is answered in the affirmative, I want to ask how it is possible to correct the Journal if it is now correct in itself? And is not the only way to reach this question to move to discharge the Committee on Revision of the Laws from the further consideration of this matter in order to refer it to another committee?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But the Chair has decided that that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that issue is not now before the House.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The Journal, as I understand it, is to record truly what takes place. It is read the next legislative day for correction provided it does not state the truth. For instance, if my vote is recorded wrong, I can rise in my place and have it corrected as I actually cast it. This Journal does speak the truth, as admitted by everybody. Then there is only one way to change it, and that is to inquire—not intimating that there has been fraud—but to inquire whether there has been fraud practiced upon the House. If so, that fraud goes to the bottom and vitiates the entry, and it can be vacated for that reason and no other.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does anybody charge that there has been fraud?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If there is absence of fraud, then I understand the record does speak the truth; and if the House were to amend it, here and now, then we amend it and make it state something that is not the truth. It strikes me that in the absence of fraud the record must stand.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say, or rather to repeat what he has already said, that the Journal is correct as to what actually occurred on yesterday. Whether the House may see fit to change that record as it appears in the Journal and make it incorrect is not for the Chair to determine. But the only question for the Chair to determine is whether it is right to entertain a motion to amend the Journal in the manner suggested, and on that point he desires the Clerk to read—

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to ask a question. Has the Chair a right to entertain a motion the effect of which would be to falsify the record?

The SPEAKER. The issue as stated by the Chair is the question whether the motion to amend the Journal can be made? The adoption or rejection of such amendment is a question for the House to determine and is not a question for the Chair to determine.

Mr. PHISTER. In other words, the Chair says the House ought not to so amend the reference as to make the Journal state a falsehood.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not said that, but confines himself to the question whether he has the power to refuse to entertain a motion made by a member, when the Journal is under consideration, to amend the same. But the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion being made to amend the Journal of the House, while that Journal is passing under the judgment of the House for correction, the chairman decided that, should a motion to amend the Journal be laid upon the table, the Journal does not accompany it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits a case in point, which is the celebrated New Jersey case, and the Clerk will read also the preceding portion, on which the said decision was based.

The Clerk read as follows:

At twelve o'clock, meridian, John Quincy Adams, the chairman, called the members to order.

The Journal of yesterday was read; when

Mr. Wise, of Virginia, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Journal of yesterday be amended by inserting the following paper, to wit—

The SPEAKER. It is not now necessary to read further.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I desire to ask the Chair if the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to amend the Journal is not tantamount to a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. That the Chair has nothing to do with. The Chair has stated his views as to that.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Ohio on the table.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio be reduced to writing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia moves to lay the motion of the gentleman from Ohio on the table.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves to amend the Journal so as to refer the bill introduced by the gentleman from Illinois yesterday to the Committee on Ways and Means; the Journal now stating, and correctly, that the bill was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the motion of the gentleman from Ohio simply a motion in another form to reconsider the reference of the bill?

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House. The question for the Chair was whether he would entertain the motion. He has entertained it, and the gentleman from Georgia moves to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. NICHOLLS. And upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Does not the rule require that an amendment shall be in writing?

The SPEAKER. This is a motion.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. But it is a motion to amend. Does not the rule require that such a motion shall be in writing so that the House should know what the amendment is?

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed is to strike out "Revision of the Laws" and insert "Ways and Means."

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. We do not know whether it is a motion to correct an error, or a motion to falsify the record, until we have its precise words.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he has stated the proposition clearly.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 117, not voting 57; as follows:

So the motion to lay Mr. GARFIELD's motion on the table was agreed to.

After the second roll-call,

Mr. DAVIS, of California, said: I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from California answer to his name on either roll-call?

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I was in the House.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman did not answer on either roll-call he cannot now vote under the rule.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, with Mr. COVERT.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. SAPP.

Mr. KEIFER with Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey.

Mr. RICHMOND with Mr. PRESCOTT.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, with Mr. MILES.

Mr. CRAPO with Mr. KENNA.

Mr. FORT with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. SCALES with Mr. ERRETT.

Mr. DICK with Mr. BLISS.

Mr. MORTON with Mr. COX.

Mr. KETCHAM with Mr. EWING.

Mr. EVINS with Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia, with Mr. WHITE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, with Mr. ANDERSON—on this vote.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to say that I am paired only on political questions with Mr. MILES.

Mr. NEW. I desire to state that my colleague from Indiana, Mr. HOSTETLER is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. DUNN. I ask the Clerk to read the condition on which I am paired with the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. SAPP. I am not paired on this question as I understand, and have voted.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 17, 1880.

We agree to pair from and after this date until April 10, 1880, on all yeas-and-nay votes of a political character on which the democratic and republican parties shall be opposed; provided that this pair shall not operate to prevent a quorum of the House.

The above is correct.

P. DUNN, Arkansas.

W. S. SAPP, Iowa.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. Would it be in order to move to reconsider the last vote and to move to lay that motion to reconsider on the table?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. Then I make that motion.

Several MEMBERS. Withdraw the motion.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion to reconsider and lay on the table.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point that it is too late for the gentleman to do that.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on that motion.

Mr. AIKEN. Will the Chair state what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] was laid on the table. In other words, it is what is termed the clinching motion, one conclusive in its effect if adopted.

Mr. CONGER. And those who wish to reconsider would vote "no;" against laying on the table, I understand. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is very well able to answer that question for himself.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 123, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—119.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

The following pair was announced:

Mr. HOSTETTLER (instead of Mr. EVINS) with Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio.

The question recurred upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CONGER. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. ROBINSON. And I renew it.

The SPEAKER. The point now arises whether the motion to reconsider has passed into the possession of the House.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] cannot renew it, that would seem to indicate that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSEND] has no right to withdraw it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. I desire to read the rule on that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. It is clause 2 of Rule XVI, and is as follows:

When a motion has been made, the Speaker shall state it, or (if it be in writing) cause it to be read aloud by the Clerk before being debated, and it shall then be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. A decision has been had; the House has decided not to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would consider that the vote of the House against laying on the table the motion to reconsider is a procedure on the part of the House to consider the motion to reconsider, and in a vital sense is a proceeding upon that subject. Therefore, if objection be made to the withdrawal, the Chair would rule that the motion to reconsider is in possession of the House. A decision by the Chair to the contrary would be unusual and unjust to the House, because a majority of the House by a yeas-and-nays vote have indicated a purpose to proceed with the motion to reconsider to its conclusion.

Mr. WILBER. I object to its being withdrawn.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. Does the Speaker decide that I have no right to withdraw the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the vote of the House upon laying on the table the motion to reconsider was a proceeding and decision upon the subject which is vital to the subject itself. The Chair decides that the motion to reconsider is in the possession of the House. The House has proceeded to consider it, and the Chair has not now the power to take from the majority of the House the opportunity to carry out its wish in that respect.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Not making any point upon the decision of the Chair relative to the right of the majority of the House to proceed with this matter, I desire to inquire whether the ruling of the Chair imposes upon the gentleman from Illinois, against his protest, the necessity of making the motion to reconsider the action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The motion is in the possession of the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Has not the gentleman from Illinois—

The SPEAKER. He has not control of the motion after he makes it and action been had thereon by the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Chair allow me to state the question?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know that the gentleman from Illinois no longer has control over the motion, by reason of the last vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair coincides in that view.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But has he not the right under the rule to withdraw his motion and leave it to any other member of the House to make the motion if he wants to?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois was advised by other members to withdraw the motion at the only time when he really possessed the right to do so.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, does not the rule of this House, not yet three weeks old, give to any member the right at his pleasure to withdraw any motion that he makes "before a decision or amendment?"

The SPEAKER. It does not if the House has proceeded to consider the motion.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would be obliged if the Speaker would have the provision of that rule read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has read it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. Let it be read by the Clerk.

Mr. FINLEY. Would it be in order to postpone this matter to a day certain?

The Clerk read the second clause of Rule XVI, as follows:

When a motion has been made, the Speaker shall state it, or (if it be in writing) cause it to be read aloud by the Clerk before being debated, and it shall then be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me say one word further.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Under clause 2 of Rule XVI, which has just been read by the Clerk, a member making a motion has the right at any time after debate but before decision or amendment to withdraw that motion. The gentleman from Illinois made two motions which are recognized under the rules and practice of this House. He made a motion to reconsider the action of the House, and a motion to lay that first motion on the table. Upon the second motion the vote was taken by yeas and nays, and it has been decided in the negative. No vote has been taken, no decision has been had, no amendment has been made upon the first or primary motion of the gentleman from Illinois, which is to reconsider the action of the House. Now I submit not only to this House but to the Chair that there never was a rule couched in plainer language. It is not possible by the employment of language to define more clearly any right than the right of the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw now the motion to reconsider is defined. I admit that the question is in the possession of the House.

The SPEAKER. If it is that is the end of it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But under the clear and explicit provisions of the second clause of Rule XVI, I deny that it is in the power of the Chair to force the gentleman from Illinois, against his protest, to stand upon the record of this House as moving to reconsider the late action of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not "force" the gentleman from Illinois in any respect.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Who will stand as the mover of the motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The House stands as responsible for its action.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Whose name will appear?

The SPEAKER. The whole point is in a nutshell. It turns on the question whether this motion is in the possession and under the control of the gentleman from Illinois, or in the possession and under the control of the House. The Chair thinks that a vital vote has been taken on the consideration of the proposition, and therefore rules that the motion is in possession of the House.

Mr. SAMFORD. Will the Chair allow me to make an inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SAMFORD. I do not understand the rule to say that no member can withdraw a motion in the possession of the House after the House has proceeded to consider it; it says he may withdraw it before a decision is reached.

The SPEAKER. And there has been in this case a vital vote upon the proposition itself. That has established the status of the matter in the House.

Mr. SAMFORD. But the vote has been taken not on the motion to reconsider, but upon the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois, and Mr. McLANE addressed the Chair.

Mr. SAMFORD. Have I not the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is listening to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SAMFORD. Now, the motion upon which a decision has been reached is the motion to lay on the table, not the motion to reconsider. Therefore there has been no decision upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to reconsider. He cannot, of course, withdraw the motion to lay on the table, because a decision has been reached on that.

The SPEAKER. There has been a proceeding and the yeas and nays taken on it.

Mr. SAMFORD. But the rule does not say, with all respect to the Chair, that a member shall not have the right to withdraw a motion when there has been a proceeding, but has the right to withdraw it at any time before decision has been had on it?

The SPEAKER. There has been a vote and a decision on this question, which carries it into the possession of the House.

Mr. SAMFORD. Not on this.

The SPEAKER. The House refused to lay on the table the motion to reconsider, thus leaving it before the House.

Mr. SAMFORD. Precisely.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair ruled otherwise, he would rule in opposition to a vote of the House.

Mr. ROBESON. Is not this the point, Mr. Speaker? It does not say decision on the merits of the question, but decision of the proposition—some action proposed in regard to the thing and some decision of the House on it. Now, action has been proposed and the House has decided it.

The SPEAKER. The point is a simple one, as the Chair has stated before, and it is whether this proposition is in possession and under the control of the gentleman from Illinois or in possession and under the control of the House. The Chair has decided that it is in the possession of the House. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the rule explicitly says, unless there has been a decision or amendment to the motion, the mover shall have the privilege to withdraw it. There has been no decision on the motion to reconsider. There has been no amendment of the motion to reconsider. Now, do I understand the Speaker to decide I have not the right to withdraw this motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides this motion is under the control of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And that I have no right to withdraw it?

The SPEAKER. It has been objected to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Then, with all due respect to the Chair, I take an appeal from that decision.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to make a single suggestion to the gentlemen to see if they do not recognize the justice of the ruling of the Chair in regard to this matter. At the moment when the gentleman offered to withdraw his motion to reconsider, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROBINSON] rose to ask to renew it.

The SPEAKER. But the Chair did not entertain it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I know the Chair did not entertain it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. And the gentleman from Massachusetts did not have the power to make it.

Mr. GARFIELD. He did; because he voted with you in the affirmative.

Mr. ROBINSON. I made the motion in accordance with my vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. He did; and I wish to show the House, in half a minute, the injustice of the ruling gentlemen on the other side ask the Speaker to make. If the gentleman from Illinois could have withdrawn his motion to reconsider, then the gentleman from Massachusetts, or any other man in the House who voted with the prevailing side, could have renewed it. Why? Because a vote had intervened, and after a vote has intervened, nobody could make the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SPRINGER. It could have been made any time within two days.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman from Illinois can do that thing he proposes, he cuts out every other man in the House from the right to do what he himself offered to do.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will my friend allow me?

Mr. GARFIELD. Therefore the Speaker's decision is just.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I insist on being heard. [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The appeal will be read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio I beg leave to say this: If the gentleman from Massachusetts stood in the attitude I stood in, having voted in favor of laying the motion to amend on the table, if he had the same right to make the motion I had, then I insist he still retains that right after my motion is withdrawn; and I will refer to the rules which clearly show that any time on the first or second day after the motion has been introduced any one voting in the affirmative has the right to make the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declined to entertain that motion as proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts because he considered that would be a duplication of motions.

Mr. WARNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER. Before voting on this question I wish to ask the Speaker whether a motion to reconsider and a motion to lay that motion upon the table are two distinct motions or essentially one.

The SPEAKER. They are two motions, because the latter being decided by a yea-and-nay vote in the negative, the question then recurs on the other motion which is coupled with it.

Mr. WARNER. The question turns then upon whether they are two distinct motions and can be voted on separately.

The SPEAKER. They can be, and are in this instance, separate. That is equity as well as common sense. Although coupled together, they are two motions—the motion to reconsider and the motion to lay upon the table—and the motion to lay upon the table being decided in the negative, does not decide the question in reference to the other motion.

The appeal will be read.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the appeal as submitted by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Speaker having ruled that the gentleman from Illinois had not the right to withdraw his motion to reconsider the last vote, I appeal from such decision.

The SPEAKER. That is not the decision of the Chair, the Chair submits. The Chair will state what his decision was. The Chair decided that by the action of the House this motion was in the possession of the House, and under the control of the House, and not within the control or in the possession of the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair thinks it is necessary to repeat these remarks.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOTT. Do I understand the Speaker to state he did not rule that the gentleman from Illinois had no right to withdraw his motion? A MEMBER. Without his consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules this: That the motion having been voted upon, and the opinion of the House having been expressed upon the issue involved in the proposition, that it is now in the possession of the House and not in the power of the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw such motion.

Mr. KNOTT. The Chair rules then—

Mr. REAGAN. Then the decision of the Chair amounts to a refusal to withdraw—

The SPEAKER. One at a time.

Mr. KNOTT. I have the floor. I ask, did the Chair rule that the gentleman from Illinois had not the right to withdraw his motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that he has not in this case without the consent of the House, and objection has been made.

Mr. KNOTT. If that is the ruling of the Chair why does not the appeal of the gentleman from Illinois cover it?

The SPEAKER. The appeal is stated very properly, but the Chair desired to express again to the House his views thereon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to lay the appeal of the gentleman from Illinois on the table.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am on the floor for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry, and the gentleman from Ohio has no right to take me off the floor to submit a motion.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Illinois. I made the motion to lay the appeal on the table before the gentleman from Kentucky got the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to hear what may be said on this question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am asking now as to a matter altogether different from that decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is willing to hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Whether it was in order for the gentleman from Illinois to move to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider a vote which had just been tabled. I read from the Digest of this House, which applies as well to the revised rules as to the old rules, page 302; and I refer to the Journals of the third session of the Twenty-third Congress, page 334, to the first session of the Thirty-third Congress, page 357, where it was decided that a motion to reconsider a vote laying a motion to reconsider upon the table is not in order. If entertained it would lead to inextricable confusion by piling up motion on motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. That point has not been raised in this connection.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I submit whether the gentleman from Illinois has a right to make the motion that has been voted on, and whether it was competent for the Chair to entertain it—

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only decide one point at a time. He will hereafter examine that point if it arises whether it be a good one or not. The House has acted on the motion, and thereby allows it. The gentleman now moves to lay on the table the appeal from the decision of the Chair, taken by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 152, nays 83, not voting 57; as follows:

So the appeal from the decision of the Speaker was laid on the table.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. McLANE said: I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McLANE. Is it in order to have the question stated before the vote is announced?

The SPEAKER. The motion before the House on which the yeas and nays have been called is the motion to lay on the table the appeal of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] from the decision of the Chair. The form of stating the question on an appeal is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. GARFIELD. The "ayes" upon this vote sustain the Chair's decision.

Mr. McLANE. Will the Chair permit me to state the question decided by the Chair as I understood the Chair to state it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated in substance this: that the opinion of the Chair was that the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] was in possession of the House; that the House had by a vote taken possession of it.

Mr. McLANE. One word more. The Speaker's statement was that the House had taken possession of the motion by refusing to lay the motion to reconsider on the table?

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Mr. HENDERSON with Mr. MORRISON.

Mr. LORING with Mr. BRAGG.

Mr. SHERWIN with Mr. WRIGHT, for two weeks, including to-day.

Mr. FELTON with Mr. STEPHENS.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to state that I am paired with Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania, but with the express understanding that we were not to be considered paired on tariff questions. I say this with reference to this vote and the former one.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. That motion has already been made and voted on and is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Under what rule does the gentleman from Illinois claim the privilege to repeat the motion to lay on the table?

Mr. GARFIELD. That very motion has been voted down and it cannot be entertained over again.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. There has been intervening business and I apprehend the motion to lay on the table is now in order.

The SPEAKER. What has intervened has been an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and the Chair does not think that an appeal is intervening business in such a sense as to permit the duplication of the motion to reconsider. The House has laid the appeal on the table and the question now recurs on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CONGER. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. SIMONTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 36, noes 126.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 22.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear it.

Mr. WILSON. And in that connection I desire to make a remark or two, with a view, if I can, to solve this trouble, that we may go on with the business of the House. The Speaker, this morning, immediately upon the Journal being read, inquired if there were objections to approving the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia has risen to make a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair will hear him.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman from Michigan surely cannot object to my making a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON. The point is this: when the question is propounded by the Speaker whether the Journal shall be approved or not, suppose one gentleman rises in his seat and objects, is it not usual for the Speaker to take the sense of the House whether the Journal shall be approved or not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled that it is competent for any member to move to amend the Journal and has cited the cases which establish his ruling in that respect.

Mr. WILSON. Suppose I object to approving the Journal of yesterday, would it be competent then for the Speaker to submit to the House the question whether the Journal shall be approved or not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair usually submits the question in this shape: "If there be no objection the Journal of yesterday stands approved."

Mr. WILSON. Suppose I rise in my place and object to approving the Journal for the reason there was some improper reference of a bill on yesterday, would not that bring the question directly before the House? Would it not then be proper for the Speaker to submit the question whether my objection should prevail or not?

The SPEAKER. That is in substance what is now being considered by the House.

Mr. WILSON. Would not that bring before the House directly the question whether the reference should be changed? I am in favor of changing the reference and with that view make the inquiry.

If it be now competent for me to do so, I object to approving the Journal of yesterday for the reason there was an improper reference of that bill on yesterday. I ask that my objection be submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us try if we cannot settle this without the yeas and nays. I presume gentlemen will have no objection to a reconsideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that this question be postponed until to-morrow morning that we may go on with the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. This is a motion of higher privilege.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is it?

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider. The gentleman can move to postpone the motion to reconsider.

Mr. SPRINGER. Rule XVI, clause 4, is as follows:

4. When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, to take a recess, to lay on the table, for the previous question, (which motions shall be decided without debate,) to postpone to a day certain, to refer or amend, or to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order.

Mr. FINLEY. And your motion is to postpone the motion to reconsider?

Mr. SPRINGER. That is my motion, in order that we may now proceed to the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion to postpone.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think that after the House has slept upon this question for one night, members will come here to-morrow morning with the belief that they cannot amend the Journal in the manner proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is this: If the Journal of yesterday's proceedings be not approved at all, as it has not yet been approved, will not all references made yesterday, all entries in that Journal be unofficial and unauthorized?

Mr. SPRINGER. It has frequently happened that we do not approve the Journal for several days.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the question of the Chair. It is this: Until this Journal be approved by the House, is it officially a record of the proceedings of the House? And I ask gentlemen if they wish that there shall be no official record of the proceedings of the House yesterday?

Mr. McMILLIN. It is a prima facie record.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Ohio to state his question again.

Mr. GARFIELD. When a question is raised about approving the Journal, and the Journal is not approved by the House, as this has not been, is the record of the proceedings of the House yesterday, which was read from the Clerk's desk this morning, our official record at all?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is competent for the House to postpone the consideration of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not object to the entertaining of that motion. But I say that so long as the House does not approve its Journal of yesterday's proceedings, so long that Journal is not our official record at all.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not decide that point now; the question may properly come before the House hereafter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The Journal was approved this morning.

The SPEAKER. Objection was raised to the approval of the Journal.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio. It is whether it has not frequently happened that the question of approving the Journal has been postponed until a later period than the day after the proceedings which it records?

Mr. GARFIELD. Oh, yes.

Mr. SPRINGER. And we can do that now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think we had better not.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to postpone this matter until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. To what time to-morrow?

Mr. SPRINGER. Until after the morning hour.

Mr. TUCKER. I hope we will not postpone it. We have been at it now for nearly three hours; let us finish it.

The question was taken upon the motion to postpone; and upon a division there were—ayes 53, noes 118.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. SPRINGER called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being but 24 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the motion to postpone was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to amend the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was laid on the table; upon which motion the gentleman from Michigan calls for the yeas and nays.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry; I have never before made one.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. It is admitted that the Journal as read this morning is correct of the proceedings of the House yesterday. Now, if by indirection and a motion to correct the Journal you can repeal the legislative action of yesterday, why can we not to-morrow morning come back here and if we have a majority repeal this action of to-day.

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of an argument. The question is upon ordering the yeas and nays upon the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I give notice that I will to-morrow morning move to correct the Journal of to-day's proceedings, if this motion is carried out. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAMFORD. This controversy involves a proper construction of the rules. I understood the Speaker at the commencement of this difficulty to-day to refer to a decision which was made by Mr. John Quincy Adams as sustaining the point that a point of order against a motion to amend the Journal made the succeeding day is not well taken.

The SPEAKER. That was not the decision; it was the entertainment of a motion.

Mr. SAMFORD. Precisely. Now, I desire to ask this question: whether on that very day of that decision of Mr. Adams the House did not reverse that decision of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. The House entertained the motion nevertheless, and it has gone into the record as a guide for all subsequent Houses.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The House decided that the Speaker was wrong in entertaining the motion.

Mr. SAMFORD. I am addressing the Chair now. I would inquire of the Chair if on that occasion there was not an appeal from the decision of the Chair that such a motion was in order, and did not the House sustain that appeal and reverse its decision?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. SAMFORD. I will send up the record. I would inquire of the Chair whether the ruling of the Chair or the decision of the House on that occasion determines the question?

The SPEAKER. The House decided—

Mr. SAMFORD. If the House reversed the decision of Mr. Speaker Adams—

The SPEAKER. He was not Speaker; he was in the chair temporarily for the purpose of organizing the House.

Mr. SAMFORD. Well, he made a ruling which the House reversed. Now, I would inquire which was the proper construction of the rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the decision of the House referred to did not touch the question of the submission by the temporary chairman of the proposition to amend the Journal.

Mr. SAMFORD. Very well; with due respect for the Speaker, I ask to have the record read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the members present, those who voted in the affirmative are, &c.

The House having thus refused to lay the resolution on the table—

The SPEAKER. The House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. SAMFORD. That is not the part of the record I ask to be read. Here is what I allude to. Mr. Wise, of Virginia, moved to amend the Journal by inserting something. Mr. Dromgoole, after the Chairman had held that it was in order to make such a motion, raised the point of order that a motion to amend the Journal could not be made. After the Chair had decided that it was in order to make such a motion, Mr. Dromgoole appealed from the decision of the Chair. The question was put to the House and the House reversed the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will find on examination that one decision was as to whether the motion to lay on the table the proposition to amend the Journal would carry the Journal with it.

Mr. SAMFORD. No, sir; I beg the pardon of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman be kind enough to read the portion to which he refers?

Mr. SAMFORD, (reading:)

Mr. Dromgoole reduced the question of order which he had just propounded to the Chair to writing, as follows:

"Mr. Wise, of Virginia"—

Here is the motion—

"moved to amend the Journal by inserting thereon a paper presented on yesterday by Mr. Randolph which the House refused to enter on the Journal. Mr. Dromgoole made a point of order that it is not in order under color of amending the Journal to propose to insert said paper; the decision of yesterday being still in force."

The Chairman decided that the point of order or appeal as reduced to writing was not in order or could not be moved, inasmuch as it did not recite the motion of Mr. Wise.

From this decision Mr. Dromgoole again appealed to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is on the merits of the amendment of the Journal, not on the question of admitting the motion to amend the Journal.

Mr. SAMFORD, (reading:)

And the question was put, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" and passed in the negative—yeas 105, nays 114.

The SPEAKER. That relates to the matter of the amendment and not to the question of admitting the motion to amend. Then there was the additional point raised whether the motion to lay on the table carried with it the Journal?

Mr. SAMFORD. That is at another place.

The SPEAKER. That is at another point. But the Chair thinks there was no controversy about the propriety of submitting a motion to amend the Journal—only as to the propriety of the matter of the amendment proposed.

Mr. SAMFORD. The Chair will find that the question decided by the House on that occasion is identically the same as that presented here.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay on the table the proposition to amend the Journal was entertained and the House voted on it.

Mr. SAMFORD. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will with permission of the House cause to be published in the RECORD the whole proceedings bearing upon this case and the Chair's comments thereon, and also the proceedings in a similar case which was decided in the House July 8, 1846.

The proceedings are as follows:

FRIDAY, December 13, 1839.

At twelve o'clock meridian, John Quincy Adams, the chairman, called the members to order.

The Journal of yesterday was read; when

Mr. Wise, of Virginia, moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Journal of yesterday be amended by inserting the following paper, to wit:—"

The said resolution being read,

Mr. Dromgoole submitted a question of order, as follows: "Is the motion of Mr. Wise in order, as it effects, by putting on the Journal, the very thing the House yesterday refused to spread on the Journal?"

The chairman decided the motion of Mr. Wise to be in order.

From this decision Mr. Dromgoole appealed to the House.

And, after debate,

Mr. Davis, of Indiana, moved that the subject do lie on the table.

Mr. Briggs here inquired of the Chair if the subject was laid on the table would the motion of Mr. Wise, with the paper recited in it, appear on the Journal?

The Chair decided that according to all precedent it would appear on the Journal.

From this Mr. Dromgoole appealed to the House.

In the course of the debate which ensued the Chair made a decision, from which Mr. Mercer appealed to the House, and stated his appeal in the following words: "A motion being made to amend the Journal of the House, while that Journal is passing under the judgment of the House for correction, the chairman decided that, should a motion to amend the Journal be laid upon the table, the Journal does not accompany it."

And on the question, shall the decision of the Chair "that, should the motion to amend the Journal be laid on the table, the Journal does not accompany it," stand as the judgment of the House?

It passed in the affirmative.

The question was then put on the motion made by Mr. Davis, of Indiana, that the motion made by Mr. Wise to amend the Journal do lie on the table,

And passed in the negative—yeas 102, nays 120.

The House having thus refused to lay the resolution on the table,

The question recurred on the appeal of Mr. Dromgoole from the decision of the Chair, that the motion of Mr. Wise was in order.

Mr. Petrikin moved the previous question; when Mr. Dromgoole reduced the question of order, which he had first propounded to the Chair, to writing, as follows:

"Mr. Wise, of Virginia, moved to amend the Journal by inserting thereon a paper presented on yesterday by Mr. Randolph, which the House refused to enter on the Journal. Mr. Dromgoole made a point of order, that it is not in order under color of amending the Journal to propose to insert said paper, the decision of yesterday being still in force."

The Chairman decided that the point of order or appeal, as reduced to writing, was not in order, or could not be moved, inasmuch as it did not recite the motion of Mr. Wise.

From this decision Mr. Dromgoole again appealed to the House.

And the question was put, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

And passed in the negative—yeas 105, nays 114.

The decision of the Chair was reversed, when

The question recurred on the question of order and appeal moved by Mr. Dromgoole, and as by him reduced to writing, when

A motion was made by Mr. Underwood, that the whole subject do lie on the table.

And the question being put,

It passed in the affirmative.

And the Chair has caused the Journal Clerk to prepare the following résumé of the action had on this subject in said Congress, and under the authority given by the House the same is inserted, namely:

1. That the motion of Mr. Wise to amend the Journal was in order.
2. That if the subject was laid on the table the motion of Mr. Wise, with the paper recited in it, would appear on the Journal.
3. That if the motion to amend the Journal be laid on the table the Journal did not accompany it.
4. That the appeal first taken by Mr. Dromgoole was not in order, inasmuch as it did not recite the motion of Mr. Wise.

The House on appeal decided:

1. That if the motion to amend the Journal was laid on the table the Journal did not accompany it.
2. The House refused, by yeas 102, nays 120, to lay the motion to amend the Journal on the table.
3. The House decided, by yeas 105, nays 114, that the appeal of Mr. Dromgoole from the decision of the Chair that Mr. Dromgoole's first appeal was not in order because it did not recite the motion of Mr. Wise to be in order.

The question then being on the first appeal taken by Mr. Dromgoole from the decision of the Chair, On motion of Mr. Underwood the whole subject was laid on the table without division, thus sustaining the decision of the Chair that the motion of Mr. Wise to amend the Journal was in order, and the resolution as proposed by him appears in full in the Journal of that day's proceedings. (See Journal, first session Twenty-sixth Congress, pages 27 and 28.)

WEDNESDAY, July 8, 1846.

The Journal of yesterday having been read, Mr. Tibbatts moved "to correct the same by omitting all proceedings in relation to the call of the House moved by Mr. Dromgoole, following the decision of the Speaker upon the resolution offered by Mr. McKay, requiring absentees to render excuses for their absence whenever they shall next appear in the House."

And, after debate,

The previous question was moved by Mr. Barclay Martin and seconded, and the main question was ordered and stated, namely: Shall the Journal be corrected as proposed by Mr. Tibbatts? when

Mr. Brockenbrough raised the question of order that the Journal of yesterday was made up in accordance with the Constitution of the United States and was true in point of fact, and being true could not be altered unless shown to be untrue.

The Speaker overruled the point of order on the ground that the Constitution does not specify the manner in which the Journal shall be kept, and the House has the control thereof, and may judge what are and what are not proceedings.

From this decision of the Speaker Mr. Brockenbrough appealed, And the question being put, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

It was decided in the affirmative.

The question recurred upon the main question, namely: Shall the Journal be corrected?

And being put,

It was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 101.

So the House refused to amend the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House, on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. NICHOLLS,] laid on the table the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to amend the Journal. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. FROST. Would it be in order now to move an adjournment?

Mr. GARFIELD. That motion has just been voted down.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn has been voted down.

Mr. FROST. But there has been intervening business.

The SPEAKER. There has been no intervening motion, the Chair thinks.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll. When four names had been called

Mr. THOMAS TURNER said: I desire to vote intelligently on this question. I will ask whether the Speaker decided—

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order during the roll-call; and four names have been called.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. Unless we understand the question we cannot vote intelligently.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the gentleman himself. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. If by a motion to correct the Journal we can change the legislative action taken upon a bill yesterday, can we not to-morrow by a motion to correct the Journal of to-day change the action we may now take?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to amend the Journal, not to correct it.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 123, nays 111, not voting 58; as follows:

Mr. WASHBURN with Mr. POEHLER, on all votes taken to-day.

Mr. HOSTETLER with Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio.

Mr. KETCHAM with Mr. EWING.

Mr. DEUSTER with Mr. HEILMAN, for this afternoon.

Mr. FELTON with Mr. STEPHENS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now demand the previous question on my motion.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I move to strike out the word "amend" and insert the word "falsify."

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to know whether the question now is not to lay on the table the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to amend?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is on the motion to amend the Journal.

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, the House laid upon the table the proposition to amend. We have reconsidered the vote by which we laid that on the table. Does not the question recur now on the motion to lay on the table the gentleman's motion to amend?

The SPEAKER. Upon reflection the Chair thinks the gentleman is correct, and the question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, as the House has reconsidered the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. What becomes of the motion to lay on the table—the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD?]

The SPEAKER. It comes up now.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NICHOLLS] to lay upon the table the motion to amend of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The SPEAKER. That is the pending motion.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to know what the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the Journal record to be read of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GARFIELD moved to amend the Journal by striking out the words "Revision of the Laws" and inserting "Committee on Ways and Means."

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia to lay upon the table the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to amend.

Mr. MCKENZIE. And I move to strike out the word "amend," and insert the word "falsify."

Mr. BLAND. Is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to correct the record? Is it not, on the contrary, a motion to change the proceedings of the House of yesterday?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to amend the Journal.

Mr. BLAND. What were the proceedings of the House? Was that bill referred yesterday to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, or was it referred to the Committee on Ways and Means? Was it not referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. BLAND. This then is to take it from that committee and refer it to another committee.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the House. The effect of the vote of the House is for the House itself to consider in voting.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to make a further parliamentary inquiry, and it is this: whether to take a bill from a committee of the House to which the House yesterday referred it and to refer it to another committee is any amendment of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, and whether on the contrary it is not a proceeding to change and not to correct the record of yesterday's proceedings?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already expressed an opinion thereon. It is now for the House to determine.

Mr. GARFIELD. It does both; it amends the record and changes the reference.

Mr. PHISTER. If it be in order, I move to refer this entire subject to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. If the House should reach a stage of proceedings when the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is before the House the motion to refer might be entertained.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This I conceive to be an important question. It is not simply a technical one; but the question really is whether we are to have any reduction of the tariff or not. That is the issue now before the House. That being the fact, I desire the House distinctly to understand what is the question before it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House well informed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia is sustained all will understand that a vote in that direction is in favor of repealing the duty on printing-paper, on salt, and on other articles. I wish—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is not in order. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia is not debatable. The question is to lay on the table the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FINLEY. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Can this House, Mr. Speaker, do indirectly what it cannot do directly?

The SPEAKER. The House itself is the judge of that.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House refused to adjourn.

Mr. AIKEN. I hope the Speaker will state the question. It seems to be quite mixed. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NICHOLLS] to lay upon the table a motion to amend the Journal of yesterday's proceedings made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] and on that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 111, nays 120, not voting 61; as follows:

So the House refused to lay on the table the amendment of the Journal proposed by Mr. GARFIELD.

The Clerk announced the following pair:

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, is paired with Mr. SLEMONS after this vote.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MCKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to amend—

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the previous question on my motion.

Mr. FINLEY. I move to postpone indefinitely the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio before the previous question was demanded.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to give notice that I shall move to indefinitely postpone this matter when it is in order to make that motion.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have demanded the previous question on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky was recognized to submit an amendment to the motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I demand the previous question on his amendment and mine.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky will state his motion.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Ohio by striking out the word "amend" and inserting the word "falsify."

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the previous question.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. Is not that a fact?

Mr. PHISTER. I move to refer the motion of the gentleman from Ohio with the amendment of my colleague to the Committee on the Judiciary; and if it is in order I desire to make a few remarks upon the subject.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order because the previous question has been demanded. But the Chair will submit the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. PHISTER. Do I understand that the Chair entertains my motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the motion under the latter portion of the first clause of Rule XVII, which provides—

That it shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee.

Mr. PHISTER. Have I the floor on my motion?

The SPEAKER. Not pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is the motion?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to commit the motion, with the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GARFIELD. What! commit a motion?

The SPEAKER. That is the old rule and practice of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. But suppose I would move to adjourn, and somebody moves to commit that?

The SPEAKER. That affects the time during which the House will sit.

Mr. McMILLIN. We are resorting to new methods any way.

Mr. GARFIELD. A resolution or a bill can be committed, but not a motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the former rule of the House. The Clerk read as follows:

47. Motions and reports may be committed at the pleasure of the House.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing in the new rule to preclude that.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is the meaning of the word "motion"? Suppose I move to postpone this bill till some day next week, and somebody moves to commit that motion to postpone to the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is made in good faith, because it is a question on which the House might desire to have a judicial judgment.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Kentucky has made a motion to commit my motion to the Committee on the Judiciary. Suppose I now rise and move to commit his motion to the Committee on Ways and Means, and somebody else gets up and moves to commit my motion to some other committee; and so on ad infinitum, without limit, motions to commit motions will never end. Motions to commit must be about bills or resolutions.

The SPEAKER. But the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is rather in the nature of an amendment in the second degree.

Mr. PHISTER. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is to amend the Journal of yesterday by having it recite what did not take place; that is, by having it recite that a bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, when by the actual action of this House yesterday it was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws?

The question as to the power of this House to thus alter its record the day after its proceedings have occurred is one of very great importance. It soars above the question whether we shall have an increase or diminution of the tariff. It is a question of the sanctity of our records. What matter our proceedings if they be not correctly recorded, or if the record of the actual proceedings can be altered by a motion next day so as to recite different proceedings? It is therefore an important question to have it determined by the deliberate action of this House, after it has been considered by the Judiciary Committee, the law committee of the House, whether we have any such power.

This motion is made in good faith in order that there may be no precipitate or hasty action on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, which, it seems to me, will set a very dangerous precedent. It is made in order that our powers may be carefully considered. If it is contemplated in one light that on a motion to amend the Journal of yesterday we can have a different reference of a bill from what was made yesterday, that is an important question. If it is contemplated in the light that by a motion to amend the Journal we can have the Journal record what did not take place yesterday, or proceedings different from those that did take place, that is a higher and more important question.

In support of the proposition I make I refer to what took place—although I have not had an opportunity to read the proceedings myself—when John Quincy Adams, Speaker pro tempore, made the ruling to which the Speaker has referred.

The SPEAKER. That is referred to in the Digest.

Mr. PHISTER. When he made that ruling and it was reversed—

The SPEAKER. It was not reversed.

Mr. PHISTER. On an appeal from his decision it was, as I understand, reversed by the House, and then the whole question was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to determine the power of the House. There is that precedent in favor of the proposition I now make; and upon that proposition I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MILLS. Would it not be in order to move that the committee be instructed to report this back to the House?

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a single word on the point which has been raised.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I made a motion to adjourn some time ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was not on the floor. The floor was held by another gentleman.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am on the floor now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is on the floor. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT] to make the motion to adjourn at the proper time.

Mr. GARFIELD. I entirely sympathize with the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PHISTER] that there are important questions involved here. If this is a matter in which the only thing the House had to do was to act as a scrivener and merely say the writing on the Journal was correct, then what these gentlemen say would be true. And I know there is some force in the way the question presents itself to the minds of some gentlemen here when they say I have made a motion to recite on the Journal what did not in fact take place. I appreciate the force of that. But I want to state to gentlemen the meaning of this motion, that they may see what I did intend by it.

Here is a judge who has just delivered his judgment; but it has not been recorded. Before he has recorded the judgment he finds out that somebody has deceived him, that the attorneys, one or the other of them, have deceived him on some matter of fact. He vacates the judgment before it is recorded. He does not allow it to be recorded, but he enters the judgment as it ought to be.

Mr. KNOTT. Will the gentleman answer me one question?

Mr. GARFIELD. In a moment.

Mr. KNOTT. I prefer that the question should be put right here.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

Mr. KNOTT. Suppose the judgment had been recorded, would the judge strike it out?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think not. I think a bill of review or something of that kind would be got up. Now this our judgment has not been recorded. The journal clerk has not made our record; we make it.

Mr. PHISTER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will in a moment. The journal clerk reads to us merely what he proposes as our record; and if it be approved by us it becomes our record. If we do not approve it, he cannot make a record for us. What has happened here in this case? The Clerk read to us this morning a record of yesterday's transactions. That record as he read it showed that this House had been deceived, and had allowed a thing to be done not according to its rules, and not according to its desire in the case. Now the House has only this remedy by which to correct the deception and to protect itself; that is, to strike from the record the improper reference, and make it up in such a manner that it will show the wish and judgment of this House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PHISTER] for a question.

Mr. PHISTER. Suppose that proceedings in court actually took place on yesterday and the Clerk has reduced them to writing, could the judge upon a motion to correct the record permit those proceedings to be reversed?

Mr. GARFIELD. Provided he found he had been deceived and defrauded, as is true in this case.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Will the gentleman now allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does the gentleman insinuate or intend to assert that by the introduction of this bill from my seat here as a Representative from the State of Illinois, and having it referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, I have attempted to practice a deception or fraud on this House?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not intend to insinuate anything; but I say to the gentleman that he did deceive the House. [Loud applause.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I say to the gentlemen on the other side—

Mr. GARFIELD. And I am here to use the only power in my hands to correct his deception. And I do not think he will try it again, or any other gentleman here. That is the meaning of this whole business. [Renewed applause.] Now, has any other gentleman any question to ask?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have a question, and I desire to answer you.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will allow you to ask any question you desire.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will answer you—

Mr. GARFIELD. Ask your question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire in the first place to assert here—

Mr. GARFIELD. Ask your question.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will put my question in my own fashion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have the floor, and if you have any question to ask, put it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will put a question to you.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well, put it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. When the State of Illinois was called yesterday I rose to my feet and offered a bill. The title of that bill is to this effect, that certain sections of title 33 of the Revised Statutes be revised and amended. That bill was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws in the open House.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not in an open manner.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It was in the open House. The Clerk read the title in a loud and clear tone from that desk. That bill, by the action of this House, was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. Now, I ask the gentleman if he means to insinuate or to assert that by that action I have attempted a deception upon this House?

Mr. HAZELTON. He has answered that already.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer the gentleman directly. Not less than ten times within the last two weeks—

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Answer my question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer it in my own way. Not less than ten times within the last two weeks have different gentlemen tried to get the question of the tariff in some form sent to some other committee than the Committee on Ways and Means, and the House has always refused to do it, and, as the gentleman well knows, the House has recently adopted a rule, which I hold in my hand, that provides—

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman—

Mr. GARFIELD. A rule that provides that all proposed legislation relating "to the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States shall be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means." Now, knowing that rule, knowing the repeated action of the House, the gentleman from Illinois under the cover of figures, the numbers of sections, in a title to his bill which explains nothing, which did not even allow the Speaker to know what it was, as he could not know—for had the Speaker known it he would have been compelled by this rule to have sent that bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, and had any man of the one hundred and forty men on this floor known what the bill was he would then and there have objected to the reference—and the gentleman well knowing that state of mind in this House, knowing the rule, and knowing the ruling which had been given by the Speaker, put in a bill, under the cover of Arabic numerals, so that nobody knew what it was. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman has failed to answer my question, I desire to say in reply that the bill introduced by me could be easily understood by any intelligent gentleman on this floor who is familiar with the statutes; especially might it be understood by those watchful gentlemen, those vigilant agents of the protectionists of this country, who occupy seats on the other side of the House. What was the title of the bill? It was "A bill to revise and amend sections 2503, 2504, and 2505 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States." If the gentleman, a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, is willing to confess ignorance, is willing to assert he did not know that title 33 related to the tariff, then it is a question for him to settle between himself and the people who have sent here a man of such ignorance.

Mr. GARFIELD rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not yield now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois cannot be interrupted without his consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not ask to interrupt him. I yielded to him; and I do not take it back.

Several MEMBERS, (to Mr. GARFIELD.) You took your seat.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to say in justification that the only complaint which has been alleged against me or this bill is that I did not write upon the title of the bill the word "tariff." This is all that is alleged.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in regard to my motives in sending the bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, I knew well—because I know the gentleman from Ohio and I know the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means—I knew that you might as well put a bill in favor of revising the tariff into the fire and reduce it to ashes as to send it to that committee. What further do I know? That the Committee on Ways and Means, or a majority of them, have not been seeking to prepare business for legislation, but have during this session been suppressing bills, smothering bills. They have been seeking to prevent an expression of a majority of the people as represented in this House. My purpose was to send that bill to a committee which would make a report to this House, so that a majority of the people's Representatives on this floor might have an opportunity to express their views. That is the long and short of my motive. My object was to send the bill to a committee which will not smother it, which will not suppress the bill, which will give to the majority of the Representatives of the people an opportunity to say whether the people shall longer be bound hand and foot as mere hewers of wood and drawers of water to the tariff monopolists of this country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish—

Mr. HASKELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Is a substitute in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has demanded the previous question.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Can he demand the previous question and then surrender that demand for a half-hour speech?

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen were settling a personal controversy; and on that account the Chair entertained the discussion.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. If a substitute is in order, I move as a substitute for the motion to amend the Journal that the Journal be now approved.

Mr. PHISTER. Does the Chair decline to entertain my motion?

The SPEAKER. On the contrary, the Chair has repeatedly said that he did entertain it.

Mr. PHISTER. I understood the Chair to say just now that the gentleman from Ohio moved the previous question.

The SPEAKER. On the various motions.

Mr. PHISTER. My motion was first.

The SPEAKER. The question will first be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PHISTER.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Only one word further. I wish to know whether the gentleman has, as I have been informed by others, accused me by his language here this afternoon of a willful desire to deceive this House. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, the English language is tolerably plain and my voice is tolerably good. I think everybody understands my attitude on that subject. I ask to have read from the New York World my answer.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to answer the gentleman. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. GARFIELD. I have sent my answer to the desk in print and I want it read. [Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I now rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have the floor. I have sent up my answer to be read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, (to Mr. GARFIELD.) No, sir; you cannot shift the responsibility. I propose to hold you responsible. I desire to answer. I simply yielded the floor to him to answer me.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen must be seated and order must be preserved. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have the floor and only yielded to the gentleman to hear his answer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am answering his question and send my answer to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have the floor and wish to reply to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has asked a question of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hold the floor and propose to reply to him.

The SPEAKER. Hear his answer.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have heard his answer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask my answer be read. [Cries of "Read!" "Read!"]

The Clerk read as follows:

THE PROTECTIONISTS OUTWITTED.
[Special dispatch to the World.]

WASHINGTON, March 22.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, very cleverly outwitted the anti-reform tariff men and the Ways and Means Committee of the House to-day by getting a tariff bill referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, of which he is a member. His bill bore a very simple title, proposing to amend a section of the Revised Statutes, and when the title was read no one, not even CONGER, [loud laughter,] suspected the real purpose of the bill, which was to admit, free of duty, salt, paper, printing machinery and types, and all chemicals entering into the composition of paper. Heretofore all efforts to refer tariff bills to committees, other than that on Ways and Means, have met with formidable opposition by the republicans and democratic protectionists, together with that other class of democrats who prefer not even indirectly to vote a lack of confidence in the leading committee of the House. To-night the tariff reformers are rejoicing over the success of TOWNSHEND's scheme, while the protectionists and those averse to any change in the tariff laws at this session are correspondingly perplexed. There is no doubt that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws will favorably report Mr. TOWNSHEND's bill at the earliest opportunity, and as the desire has been all along simply to get some tariff proposition before the House, it will matter little now whether or not the Ways and Means Committee does anything at all this session.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to know what paper that is. [Laughter on the republican side.]

The CLERK. The New York World.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to have some gentleman say who sent that off last night. [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not propose that the gentleman from Ohio shall shift the responsibility between him and me upon the correspondent of the New York World. I wish to say to the gentleman from New York that if he insinuates here— [Laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Has the gentleman got any weapons now? Is this a serious business? Let us understand it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio must not interrupt the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish the gentleman to understand that he cannot under the cover of monkey-shines escape the responsibility which rests on him. I wish him to understand that I am his peer as a Representative upon this floor; and here, before this House, I say to him that if he insinuates [laughter on the republican side] that I have been guilty of deception here, I desire to say to him that he has been guilty of willful and deliberate falsehood. [Applause on the democratic side.] I do not expect him and other gentlemen, who perhaps have the same sentiment as himself with regard to matters of courage, to answer me in any other way than by derision; but I desire him to understand that I stand here upon my responsibility as a representative of the people and say to him that, under the circumstances which I have here related, I brand his charge as willfully and deliberately false. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. GARFIELD. After that indecent exposure of his person and his mind I have no more to say. [Laughter and applause on the republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is on the motion to commit, and the gentleman from Ohio demands the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. PHISTER. I demand the yeas and nays on my motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUCKNER. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 51, noes 128.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on Mr. PHISTER's motion.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 106, nays 125, not voting 61; as follows:

So the motion to commit was not agreed to.

When the Clerk had completed the list of names of those who failed to respond on the first call,

Mr. BOWMAN said: Mr. Speaker, I desire, if it be in order, to have my name recorded. I was in my seat each time when the names were called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot ask such permission after the second call of the roll.

Mr. BOWMAN. But I was in my seat when both lists of names were called, and did not observe when my name was reached.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House the power to vote is exhausted when the last name is called on the second call of the roll.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BERRY, on this vote, but I observed when the Clerk read the names of those voting that his name was recorded as having voted. If he voted, I ask that I be allowed to vote. I think, however, his name is recorded by mistake.

The SPEAKER. It is hardly possible that the gentleman voted if he was paired.

Mr. WARNER. I do not think that he has been here for two hours. Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. He has not been in the House for a considerable time, to my knowledge.

Mr. KELLEY. Then his name should be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done without the consent of the gentleman himself, as his name appears in some way to have gotten upon the roll.

Mr. WILLIS. He left about twenty-five minutes ago, saying that he was going home.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. He left the House before this vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. Then some one must have answered to his name. Mr. DAVIS, of California. Then I ask that I be allowed to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks, in view of the fact that his colleague with whom he was paired is recorded as having voted, that he also be allowed to vote.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from California did not vote on the idea that he was paired, he should have the right to vote now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California did not vote because he was under the impression that he was paired.

Mr. SPARKS. There is no doubt that the vote of the gentleman's colleague should be withdrawn or that he himself should be allowed to vote. But as it is reported that the gentleman has not been here at all during the roll-call, his name should certainly be withdrawn, as there is evidently a mistake in the roll.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to say in behalf of my absent colleague [Mr. BERRY] that I am satisfied he was not in the House when his name was called, and that the record of his vote is an error.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman from California can vote by unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope unanimous consent will be given to him for that purpose.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman from California should be permitted under the circumstances to cast his vote.

Mr. FROST. Would it be in order to move to amend the record by inserting the gentleman's name?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman claims the right to vote on the ground that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. BERRY, who is recorded as having voted; and the Chair thinks under the circumstances that he should be allowed the same privilege.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri how he could amend the record if the gentleman from California is not present, or permitted to say how he will vote?

Mr. FROST. I wish the gentleman to vote; I wish to facilitate his voting.

Mr. DAVIS, of California. Before voting I desire to state I am satisfied that my colleague is not here, and that the answer to his name was by some mistake; but under the circumstances I will vote "no."

Mr. KENNA. My pair has been announced during the roll-calls today with Mr. CRAPO, of Massachusetts, who is absent. I desire now to say that I should not have voted to so amend the record of yesterday as to make it state that anything occurred which did not occur, or that anything did not occur which did occur. The record states precisely what took place, and I should therefore have voted on this proposition in the line of sustaining the absolute veracity of the record.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to move to dispense with the reading of the names.

The following additional pairs were announced by the Clerk:

Mr. NEWBERRY is paired with Mr. SPEER.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island, is paired with Mr. SLEMONS.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. McLANE. I rise for the purpose—

The SPEAKER. The previous question is pending.

Mr. McLANE. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McLANE. I desire the Clerk to read the ninth rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Questions of privilege shall be: First, those affecting the rights of the House, collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings.

Mr. McLANE. The question I desire to raise is on the obligation of the House to maintain the integrity of its proceedings. That not only excludes the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] to amend the proceedings, and make them something that they were not, but it puts on this House the obligation to make the proceedings what they ought to be. When a bill is presented here through the petition-box, or on the call of States on Monday, it must be referred in conformity with the rules; and where a bill is presented to repeal this or that section of the Revised Statutes which relates to the revenue laws, the only reference of that, under the rule, should be to the Committee on Ways and Means, and it matters not whether it be an act of the individual member in making the reference, or of the Speaker. The Speaker might very well inadvertently refer a bill, as was done yesterday; or the individual member might inadvertently refer a bill through the petition-box.

Whether it be a reference by the Speaker or the individual member, if it be an improper reference in conflict with the rules, when that fact is revealed after reading the Journal, it is the duty of the House to send that bill where it ought to go under the rule. [Cries of "That is right!"] If the House fail in this duty, the committee to whom the bill has been improperly referred should report it back for a proper reference, and the rules expressly provide for such a contingency in the case of bills referred through the box, when the reference does not appear in the Journal.

Now, when the Journal was read to-day, it appeared that the bill presented by the gentleman from Illinois to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes was referred in due course to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. There was no vote of this House. The gentleman from Illinois made no motion—the Journal shows no motion of the gentleman from Illinois to refer that bill. The bill went by direction of the Speaker, or may be by direction of the Clerk, following the indorsement on the back of the bill, perhaps. At all events, the entry is made upon our Journal that it was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. Now, under our rule that is not a proper reference; and when this fact is revealed on the reading of the Journal, in my judgment, it is a question of privilege for any member of this House to move the proper reference. I now rise to make that point, and move that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be discharged from its further consideration and be instructed to report that bill back to the House, and that it be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GARFIELD. That will settle the whole business in one vote.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield for that purpose?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I would like the ruling of the Chair upon that point.

Mr. GARFIELD. Would not the question of privilege come in over my motion?

The SPEAKER. Not, the Chair thinks, over the execution of the previous question, which has been ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am willing to have my motion postponed in order that we may have a vote on the question of privilege submitted by the gentleman from Maryland, if the House wants to settle this matter summarily; but not so as to give up my right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio says he is willing by consent to waive his rights until the judgment of the House can be tested whether the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland is privileged.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to the gentleman from Ohio withdrawing the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered; but the gentleman from Ohio expressed his willingness, which the Chair communicates to the House, that he would waive his rights under the previous question until the sense of the House could be taken on the question whether the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland is privileged.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to that proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it is a question of privilege it cannot be set aside by an objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not ruled whether it is a question of privilege, nor, if it is, whether it has a right to be presented now when the previous question is operating. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XVII.

PREVIOUS QUESTION.

1. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority of members present, if a quorum, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the House to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments and include the bill to its engrossment and third reading, and then, on renewal and second of said motion, to its passage or rejection.

The SPEAKER. The question of order is whether the previous question, having been ordered on the pending question as authorized by the rule just read, can now be interrupted by the operation of Rule IX, which relates to questions of privilege; the gentleman from Maryland drawing the attention of the Chair to the clause of the rule which says, "and the integrity of its proceedings." The Chair considers that would be a solution of the difficulty, but he is not clear that that question of privilege can be raised at this time as against the operation of the previous question which the House has ordered.

Mr. McLANE. With great deference to the Chair, I have no doubt the question can be raised. The only question of doubt would be whether it can take the place of another question which is under the operation of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has expressed his willingness to waive his rights under the operation of the previous question, and the gentleman from Illinois objects to his doing so.

Mr. HOOKER. I desire to say in reference to what the gentleman from Maryland has presented as a question of privilege that the ninth rule is primarily a rule which refers to the rights of the House. On yesterday, when the bill was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, the question arose as to what committee it should be referred to. That was a question of privilege affecting the rights of the House.

Mr. McLANE. No question arose as to the reference of the bill.

Mr. HOOKER. That question always arises. It was in the power of the House under the old rules, and I apprehend it is in the power of the House under these new rules, and that decision has already been made to refer any proposition to any committee. There was an illustration of this only the day before yesterday in the Senate when a question wholly foreign to the question of Territories was referred, on the motion of a Senator, to the Committee on Territories. So on the motion of a member of the House who introduces a bill the House has the right upon that motion to refer it to any committee, and the power of the House is not constrained by the provision in the rules that subjects of a particular nature shall be referred to this committee or the other.

Ordinarily a bill goes to a committee which has the subject-matter under consideration to which the bill relates. But the House may order a bill or resolution to go to any committee. Therefore the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to correct what was done on yesterday cannot be properly made in the form in which he makes it. He might have made a motion to reconsider or he might have moved that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be required to report the bill back, and that it be referred to the committee to which its subject-matter belonged. But the House has the power on motion to refer any question to any committee. Therefore, when the gentleman from Illinois made this motion it was his right to do it, and it was the duty of the Chair to refer it to the committee he moved, unless some member objected.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to make this remark that the question of privilege, as presented by the gentleman from Maryland, is based on the idea that the House has violated its rules and done wrong. If we have done so it appears to me that the proper course would be to go back to the point where the wrong was committed and correct it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland bases the question of privilege which he presents on the words of the rule "integrity of its proceedings." The Chair thinks that that question primarily presented might have involved a question of privilege, but the Chair is not called upon now to decide whether it is a higher question than the execution of the previous question that has been ordered by the House; but the Chair is quite willing to submit the question to the House whether this does involve a question of privilege and has a right to come in now.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is it competent to submit a question of privilege to the House?

The SPEAKER. In disputed questions the Chair often does so.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The Chair ought first to decide the question.

The SPEAKER. No; because if the Chair decided it, the House would be excluded from any decision of it except upon an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. REAGAN. Allow me to make this remark in the interest of justice; if we have done wrong shall we perpetuate it under the color of a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to determine. The gentleman will notice that the Chair avoids a decision whether this is a question of privilege and whether as such it properly can be entertained now, and submits that question to the majority of the House, to whose judgment the Chair always gives obedience.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I object to the submission of the question to the House.

Mr. WILBER. What right has the gentleman to object?

Mr. SPRINGER. I would inquire of the Chair if it is now competent for the House to vote down the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] upon which the previous question is operating, and then whether it would be in order for the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] to move that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be discharged from the further consideration of this bill and be instructed to report it back to the House immediately, in order that the House might again pass upon the question of reference?

Mr. McLANE. Can I not now move to reconsider the vote ordering the main question?

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the Speaker has hit the true settlement of this whole business. He says, and truly, that he has the right to submit to the House whether the proposition offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLane] is such a question of privilege that the House will now consider it. Now, if we vote that it is such a question of privilege we can decide the matter at once and all the other proceedings will fall. If that should fail, then my motion will be still pending.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is not this question really a reflection upon a member of this House? If it involves a question of the right and dignity of this House, why does it not involve the further question whether a member of this House has violated its privileges?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that question is raised at all.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think we are going too far; and therefore I hope the House will vote on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Garfield,] and vote it down, and then the Chair can entertain a motion to instruct the Committee on the Revision of the Laws to report the bill back.

Mr. REAGAN. If the House votes that this is a question of privilege, it will undoubtedly stultify itself in regard to its action of to-day.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House. The Chair refuses to decide that this is a question of privilege entitled to come in now and suspend the execution of the order of the main question. But the Chair is always governed by the majority of the House and will submit the question to the House. The Chair will cause the Clerk to read from the Manual upon the subject of questions of privilege.

The Clerk read as follows:

"A matter of privilege arising out of any question, or from a quarrel between two members, or any other cause, supersedes the consideration of the original question, and must be first disposed of." [According to the practice, not finally disposed of, but the House shall proceed to such immediate measures as it may think proper.]

Whenever the Speaker is of the opinion that a question of privilege is involved in a proposition, he must entertain it in preference to any other business. [Such opinion, of course, being subject to an appeal.] And when a proposition is submitted which relates to the privileges of the House, it is his duty to entertain it, at least to the extent of submitting the question to the House as to whether or not it presents a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that this is the unbroken practice of the House from the Nineteenth Congress. In obedience to the requirements of that decision the Chair is bound not only to entertain a question of privilege when raised, but if he has doubts on the subject he is bound to submit the question to the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Chair allow me a question?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. The question of privilege suggested by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLane] is the identical question, and no other, which the House already has before it. It is simply the same question in another form.

The SPEAKER. It may be; but the responsibility is with the House.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. One word.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. If this question of privilege is well taken, and the House sustains the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLane] in this question of privilege, then it at once renders unnecessary any further proceedings, for under this question of privilege the House will make its action conform to its rules without any conflict whatever. Therefore it takes the other question out of the way and makes it unnecessary.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CONVERSE. I understand that the House on yesterday—because the Speaker is simply the mouth-piece of the House, and what is declared from the Speaker's chair is simply the orders of the House—I understand that yesterday the House ordered this bill in question to be committed to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws and that order has been executed.

Now, will a change of the minutes of yesterday bring back from a committee that bill thus in its possession and under its control and leave it in possession of the House? That is the question. Certainly it will not. The only way to reach that question is by a motion to reconsider the action of the House on yesterday referring that bill to the committee, or its equivalent, by rescinding the order of the House sending it to that committee. You may change the Journal as much as you please and it does not effect the object which gentlemen seek. The bill has passed from the possession of the House, and no correction of the Journal will bring it back.

Mr. BARBER. I would like an answer by the Chair to that parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has ruled already on that point.

Mr. McLane. The question of privilege which I present does not apply merely to this particular case, but to all similar proceedings generally. It applies to every case that can occur. Gentlemen know very well that this is not the only bill which has been improperly referred. I know myself of three or four very important bills which have been referred either through the box or by the journal clerk, under the direction of the Speaker, to committees to which the rules would not carry them. This point is made now because the subject has been made one of importance. My proposition is a solution for this case and for every other case where, through inadvertence, negligence, or fault of any kind, an improper reference has occurred.

It has been suggested that the proposition might seem to be a reflection either upon the member who introduced the bill or upon the Speaker. It is neither the one nor the other, but is the simple and natural way of maintaining the integrity of our proceedings in conformity with our rules and avoiding confusion and conflict between the several committees of the House, confining each to its appropriate duties.

I want to say to the House that I took pains before presenting this question of privilege to ascertain that the Journal does not show that this bill was referred upon the motion of any member, and that no vote was taken by the House, and the House is only committed in the sense that it is responsible for the reference as directed by the Speaker or as made by the journal clerk, with or without the indorsement on the bill itself. Such erroneous or improper references, though correctly stated in the text of the Journal, are to be corrected by the House just as errors in the Journal itself should be corrected by the House. Thus can the House preserve the integrity of its proceedings, and maintain that integrity without dependence upon its own committees, whose duty it is to report back to the House all questions improperly referred under the rules.

Mr. CONVERSE. My friend from Maryland will allow me to suggest that no motion is necessary in order to make an order of the House referring a bill. I claim, as the gentleman does substantially, that the only way this question can be reached is by a motion to reconsider the action of the House, or to rescind its action on yesterday. That is the substance of the gentleman's motion, though not the form of it.

The SPEAKER. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Converse] the Chair desires to have read a part of the second clause of Rule XVIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

No bill, petition, memorial, or resolution referred to a committee, or reported therefrom for printing and recommitment, shall be brought back into the House on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits to the House the question whether the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLane] presents a question of privilege and should be entertained by the Chair.

Mr. KNOTT. As that question probably requires some deliberation, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 81, noes 118.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 10,500 copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for the year 1879 be printed; 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 6,500 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 91) to print the eulogies delivered in the Senate and House of Representatives upon the late George S. Houston, a Senator from the State of Alabama.

AMENDMENT OF THE JOURNAL.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and there were—yeas 91, nays 121, not voting 80; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. KING, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. HAZELTON asked to record their votes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, under the rules, cannot submit the question to the House.

The following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. MONEY with Mr. STONE.

Mr. MILLER with Mr. MULLER.

Mr. HUNTON with Mr. CHITTENDEN.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Alabama, with Mr. RYAN, of Kansas.

Mr. WILSON with Mr. ROBESON.

The SPEAKER. The question now before the House to determine is whether the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] presents a question of privilege under Rule IX. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SIMONTON. I ask that proposition be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 5265, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits whether that is a question of privilege.

Mr. MILLS. Is it in order to move to lay that upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair submits to the House whether it is a question of privilege. He has not yet permitted it to come before the House, but merely submits whether it contains a question of privilege or not. If the House determines it does contain a question of privilege, then the Chair will recognize the gentleman to make the motion to lay upon the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 105, noes 22.

Several MEMBERS. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted; but the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. SPARKS. I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet day after to-morrow at twelve o'clock m.

The SPEAKER. There is no quorum voting, the point having been raised there was no quorum; and therefore, while the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to adjourn is in order, the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, in the absence of a quorum, is not in order. The Chair will appoint tellers on the proposition.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will not submit my motion until a quorum has been announced.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Pending that, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at twelve o'clock m. day after to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will remember the point has been made there was no quorum on the last vote.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is the duty of the Chair to appoint tellers and ascertain whether a quorum is present or not.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair tried to do. The motion to adjourn is in order, although there may be no quorum; but the Chair cannot entertain in the absence of a quorum the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to adjourn over.

Mr. KNOTT. The Chair cannot tell whether a quorum is present or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is governed by the last vote, on which a quorum did not appear, and the point was raised there was no quorum.

Mr. KNOTT. How does the Chair know that since then a quorum has not come in?

The SPEAKER. If a quorum shall vote on the motion to adjourn and it is decided in the negative, then it will be known whether a quorum is present or not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I think I am entitled to press my motion. The Chair has no right to assume a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must go back to the last vote.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then it is the duty of the Chair to order tellers and see whether a quorum is present or not.

The SPEAKER. That the Chair did, but a motion was made to adjourn by the gentleman from Illinois, a motion which was in order although a quorum was not present.

Mr. BLACKBURN. My motion is to ascertain whether there is a quorum. I have grown accustomed to the Chair's rulings to-day and will yield to them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain a motion to adjourn over a regular sitting in the absence of a quorum. The Chair himself suggested, and it is due to the Chair the gentleman from Kentucky should state it, that tellers would be ordered.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is not the first time the gentleman from Kentucky has found himself at variance with the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is always under review by the House, whatever his decisions may be. If they are wrong, the House can overturn them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a parliamentary question. If the House adjourns, does this come up to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It will come up; but there will be two Journals to be approved.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will both Journals be amenable to motions to amend or rather to falsify what actually did take place?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide points of order as they rise.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am raising one now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has moved the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does the Chair overrule my attempt to fix a date to which this House shall adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply rules this, that it is not in the power of the House in the absence of a quorum to change the order of sittings from day to day.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The point of order that I make is that in the absence of a quorum, under the rules of the House, but two motions can be made—one for a call of the House, and the other to adjourn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And I make the point under the sixteenth rule that the motion to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn at any time, and at all times, under all rules, takes precedence of the motion to adjourn.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Not without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of a quorum that motion could not be entertained.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Has there been any legal ascertainment of the fact that there is no quorum present in the House?

The SPEAKER. There has been upon the vote just taken.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I deny that there has been any ascertainment of the fact, as far as the question of adjournment is concerned.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announced that there were on the last vote 105 in the affirmative and 22 in the negative, when the point was raised that no quorum had voted, and the Chair suggested the propriety of appointing tellers.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I stand prepared to grant there was no quorum on a certain motion. There is a motion now pending, which is to adjourn, and the Chair has no authority for concluding that no quorum will vote on that motion. But whatever the arbitrary conclusions of the Chair may be, or might be, I say that under the provisions of that sixteenth rule there is no condition of circumstances known to this body in which the motion to fix a day to which this House shall adjourn does not take precedence of the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that this House has not the power to adjourn over a regular sitting, provided by the rules, by less than a quorum, but the House can, with less than a quorum, vote to adjourn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Has that question ever been reached?

The SPEAKER. It is the constant practice of the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Has this House failed to-day to furnish a quorum on the motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. Not on the motion to adjourn, for that motion has not yet been submitted; but the gentleman will remember that less than a quorum can adjourn. The gentleman will also remember that on the preceding motion a quorum was not present and a further count was asked, and the Chair announced the fact, and suggested tellers.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But that absence of a quorum was not developed on a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The practice of the House will determine the point; but the Chair will submit the following from the Digest:

But when less than a quorum is present no motion can be entertained except to adjourn, or for a call of the House.—Journal, 1, 29, p. 356, and Const., 1, 5, 8.

The Constitution of the United States in article I also provides:

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner, and under such penalties, as each House may provide.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPARKS. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 78, not voting 122; as follows:

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 24, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of citizens of Cameron County, Pennsylvania, and a petition of citizens of Centre County, Pennsylvania, praying such an amendment of the patent laws as will protect innocent users of patented articles from prosecution as infringers; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Union, Centre County, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a department of agriculture; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Centre County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of a bill regulating interstate commerce; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WITHERS. I present the petition of N. M. Mitchell and others, of "the Centennial Manual Labor Industrial Arts Institute, to encourage and promote education and industry among certain citizens, and for other purposes," the object of which seems to be to request an appropriation on the part of Congress in aid of their enterprise to educate and improve the condition of the colored citizens of the South. The petition has received the indorsement of various prominent and distinguished citizens, including the President, his Cabinet, members of the Supreme Court, and members of the Senate and House. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Elizabeth E. Swan and others, heirs of Daniel Hayward and citizens of Massachusetts, praying for an extension of the patent of Daniel Hayward for the manufacture of India rubber; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Ellen M. Godfrey, widow of James A. Godfrey, late captain Company G, Thirteenth Maine Volunteers, praying that a pension be granted to herself and child; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a memorial of the Louisville Board of Trade, in favor of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and also for the establishment of better postal communication by steamships between the United States and the states of South and Central America and the West Indies; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BLAINE. I present the petition of Alfred Watts and 66 others, citizens of Thomaston, Maine, asking an inquiry into the legality of the bridge now being erected between the cities of New York and Brooklyn. The original act of Congress which gave permission for the construction of that bridge contained a proviso that the said bridge should be so constructed as not to obstruct, impair, or injuriously modify the navigation of the river. They have got some wires stretched across it now, and it is found that all vessels that have spars or masts of a height of one hundred and twenty feet are unable to pass under it; and that really embraces the great majority of the shipping—ships and barks and brigs and large schooners. That channel is the common highway between the New England States and New York and New Jersey.

These petitioners, who come from one of the largest commercial towns, the largest in ship-owning I think of any town in the United States per capita, whose business is almost entirely navigation, and all others engaged in it are feeling already very great alarm as to the possible and permanent effect of that structure.

I know nothing myself of the facts other than as embraced in the petition, which comes from a very high source. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Commerce. It is a subject that I am sure should be inquired into before it gets too far for remedy, if it be not already too far.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of teachers and older pupils of the Orleans Liberal Institute, Glover, Vermont, Henry Babcock, principal, praying that Congress will take active measures for the early adoption of the metric system of weights and measures; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALLACE presented a petition of citizens of Clearfield County, Pennsylvania, a petition of citizens of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania, and a petition of citizens of Bucks County, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a department of agriculture; which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Bucks County, Pennsylvania, a petition of citizens of Clearfield County, Pennsylvania, and a petition of citizens of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania, praying for such an amendment of the patent laws as will protect innocent users of patented articles against prosecution as infringers; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Bucks County, Pennsylvania, a petition of citizens of Clearfield County, Pennsylvania, and a petition of citizens of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania, praying for such legislation as will prevent fluctuations in freights and unjust discriminations in charges for transportation; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TELLER presented the memorial of Madison Bagby, C. W. Smith, and other citizens of Boulder County, Colorado, remonstrating against the passage of the bill submitted by what is known as the land commission, to provide for the survey and disposal of the public lands of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WHYTE presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Maryland, urging upon Congress the passage of a law making an appropriation for the establishment of a light-house and fog-bell on Bloody Point Shoals, in Chesapeake Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented a memorial of Ellen H. Sheldon, Sara A. Spencer, Caroline B. Winslow, M. D., Joseph Taber Johnson, M. D., C. B. Purvis, M. D., Susan A. Edson, M. D., and others, asking for the enactment of a law for the punishment of the crime of rape in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

FINANCIAL STATISTICS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I present a petition from citizens of Piedmont, West Virginia, which I ask leave to read, and then I shall make a few remarks upon it:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your petitioners, respectfully believing that the business interests of the country would be best served by no action on the part of Congress on the money or currency question and that the condition of the country and state of the finances are good at this time, and it is feared that any legislation upon the part of Congress would have an injurious effect upon the present and anticipated prosperity of the country which is largely due to the present confidence in our financial condition.

We respectfully ask that Congress will take no action at this session that will affect either greenbacks or silver.

This petition to Congress is signed by more than fifty of the most active and best business men of the little town of which I am a citizen. I fully agree with the signers of this paper when they ask that Congress let the currency and coinage laws alone. They tell us that they fear any action of Congress relating to the amount of paper currency or coinage of silver will have a bad effect on business and the general prosperity of the country, and that they believe that our present and anticipated prosperity is largely owing to the confidence of the people, and that Congress will let the financial question alone. I except the funding of the 5 and 6 per cent. bonds due next year into a low-interest-bearing debt.

We now have more paper money than any nation in the world. The following table, prepared by H. C. Burchard, Director of the United States Mint, giving the population, also the paper, gold, silver circulation, and the amount per capita of the leading nations of the globe, shows that we have many millions more paper circulation than any nation in the world, and that, estimating our population at forty-seven million, we have more paper money per capita than any country, the Netherlands only excepted:

The above table shows that the United States has in round numbers nearly $634,000,000 of paper money, which is more than the following nations have:

Great Britain has in round numbers	$209,000,000
Germany	229,000,000
Sweden	11,000,000
Norway	10,000,000
Denmark	18,000,000
Netherlands	73,000,000
Belgium	58,000,000
Switzerland	21,000,000
Total	629,000,000

These eight nations, including two of the leading nations of Europe, have less paper money than we have.

The table also shows that if we add paper and specie together we have less per capita than some nations, but more than an average of the twenty-four leading nations named. The average of paper and specie per capita of the twenty-four nations in the table is $15.93; the United States has $23.64.

The following table exhibits a statement of the number of State

It will be seen from the preceding table that the larger amount of paper money in circulation at any time between 1784 and 1861 was in 1857, when it was $214,778,822. We now have about $650,000,000 paper money, which is more than three times as much as at any time previous to the late war. Our population in 1860 was about thirty-one millions; it is now estimated at forty-seven millions, which is an increase of about 50 per cent. Our paper money has increased since 1860 more than 300 per cent.

The national-bank currency is now increasing at the rate of more than a million a month. I present a table comparing the population and the paper and specie circulation per capita in the United States, Great Britain, Germany, and France:

Statement showing the population and the paper and specie circulation per capita in the United States, Great Britain, Germany, and France.

This table shows that our paper money now is more than four times as much as in 1850 and more than three times as much as in 1860, and that we have three times as much gold and silver now in the country as in 1850 and fully 60 per cent. more than in 1860. According to the Finance Report (page 12) coinage of gold for fiscal year 1879, $40,986,912; coinage of silver for fiscal year 1879, $27,227,500; total, $68,214,412. This is an increase of between five and a half and six millions per month, and during the present fiscal year the average coinage is about the same. The national-bank currency is increasing at the rate of fully a million per month, which, added to the coinage of gold and silver, makes an increase of money for circulation of about seven millions per month, which is a substantial increase, or, as some call it, an inflation of our money for circulation of between eighty and ninety millions per year. Surely this ought to satisfy even the greenbackers.

I append a table which will show our paper circulation for the last three years taken from the 1879 report of the Comptroller of the Treasury. The following table exhibits, by denominations, the amount of national-bank and legal-tender notes outstanding on November 1, 1879:

I think we had better "let well enough alone" and have no legislation upon the currency or the coinage question this year.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Finance. The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1109) for the relief of Anthony Lawson, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask that that bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 627) for the relief of workmen employed in the construction of Poverty Island light-house, Lake Michigan, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 201) for the relief of Somerville Nicholson, to report it with an amendment, and submit a report thereon. I move that the report and the evidence before the court-martial, including the statement of Captain Nicholson, be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1322) for the relief of Thomas J. League, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 814) for the relief of Henry M. Shreve, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. GROOME, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 896) for the relief of Cyprian T. Jenkins, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1493) defining the duties of reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, fixing his compensation, and providing for the publishing and distributing of said reports, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Committee on the Judiciary have instructed me to report back the concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of Missouri instructing her Senators and Representatives to secure certain legislation relative to the copyright of the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and im- providently referred, because it is nothing but an instruction to the Senators and Representatives from that State upon certain subjects therein embraced. The Senate has taken action upon two or three resolutions of a similar character. The committee therefore ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and that it lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie upon the table.

Mr. THURMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3989) to remove the political disabilities of William B. Taliaferro, of Virginia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 237) directing the Secretary of the Navy to organize a board to inquire into the present condition of the double-turreted monitors and the propriety and cost of completing the same, to report it with an amendment. I wish to say in connection with this report that it relates to a matter which it is exceedingly important shall be acted upon quickly in.

order to enable us to make an appropriation for the purpose if the joint resolution shall pass at the present session of Congress. I shall ask the Senate to consider the joint resolution on Friday morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At what time?

Mr. McPHERSON. During the morning hour.

REPORT ON SHEEP HUSBANDRY.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 68) to authorize the printing of 13,000 copies of the Report on Sheep Husbandry, have instructed me to report back the same favorably, without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1528) granting an increase of pension to Allen Buckner; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1529) to provide for the payment of bounty to certain discharged soldiers of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ALLISON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1530) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of Samuel H. Moer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1531) granting a pension to Mary and Annie Plunkett; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. JOHNSTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 5256) to establish post-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ASSISTANT SENATE LIBRARIAN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Concurrent and other resolutions are now in order.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I ask the Senate to take up and dispose of a resolution which I offered some time ago to authorize the appointment of an assistant librarian for the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the resolution called for by the Senator from Georgia.

The Chief Clerk read the following resolution, reported by Mr. HILL, of Georgia, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, on the 9th instant:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an assistant librarian for the Senate, at a salary of $1,440 per annum, payable monthly, being the same amount of salary paid to assistant librarians of the House of Representatives.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does that resolution come within the provisions of the Anthony rule?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does not. It is in the morning hour, however.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to it.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Can one objection carry it over?

Mr. ALLISON. The Anthony rule does not operate in regard to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does not require unanimous consent. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I desire to have read at the Secretary's desk a letter from the Secretary of the Senate on the subject of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be reported.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, may I inquire, for information, the morning business being concluded, does not the Anthony rule operate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It does. The Chair has called the order of "concurrent and other resolutions."

Mr. CONKLING. Was this resolution introduced this morning?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was not; it was submitted several days since.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does it then come within the rule?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It comes under the head of "concurrent and other resolutions."

Mr. FERRY. Is not the resolution on the Calendar?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is on the Calendar, having been reported several weeks since, and it is like any other business that has been reported and placed on the Calendar. I insist on my objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I suppose the order of "concurrent and other resolutions" to be for the introduction of concurrent and other resolutions.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I hope the Senate will dispose of the resolution this morning. It will take but a few moments. There is no use of its lying here undisposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the consideration of the resolution is strictly in order.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Senate be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, February 25, 1880.

SIR: I respectfully submit for the consideration of your committee the propriety of an increase of the force in the library of the Senate by the appointment of an assistant librarian. The force now employed there consists of the librarian and a laborer. In the event of the absence of the librarian, from sickness of himself or the dangerous illness of any member of his family, the library is necessarily left in the sole charge of the laborer, whose duty it is to attend to the menial services of that department.

The business of the library is constantly increasing, and the duties of the librarian becoming more laborious and important by the enlargement of the number of its volumes and the greater demand upon its shelves by Senators. When a call is made for a book it is when there is immediate use for it, hence the prompt attention is required by one familiar with the location of the different volumes. This is especially the case in the midst of the discussion of important questions.

Respectfully,

JOHN C. BURCH,
Secretary United States Senate.

Hon. B. H. HILL,
Chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will state to the Senate that the matter was before the Committee on Contingent Expenses, every member of which is very much opposed to increasing the force unless where it is absolutely necessary. No man is more opposed to an increase of force than I am, but after fully considering the matter we thought this addition ought to be made. The House of Representatives has a librarian, two assistant librarians, and two messengers. The Senate has but one librarian and a laborer.

A SENATOR, (in his seat.) And he a colored man.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. And he a colored man. That is all. There is but one white man in the Library of the Senate. It sometimes happens that it is indispensable that there should be an assistant there. The Secretary of the Senate says that it is absolutely needed; and I think if the House has a librarian, two assistant librarians, and two messengers, making five in its library, the Senate librarian ought to have at least one assistant. The Secretary says, moreover, that the business is constantly increasing and accumulating. Although we were very much opposed to increasing the force, the committee finally concluded unanimously that this resolution ought to pass. I reported it not of my own motion, but by the instruction of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. How long has the present force been doing duty in the Library?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I really do not know; but I have received information from the Secretary of the Senate that the business has increased very much, and that it has become important to have an assistant. The country has been growing, the business of Congress has been increasing, as the Senator knows. It has become necessary to increase the force of every department of the Government. Business has increased in all the Departments. The Senator's idea would prevent any increase of force, clerical or otherwise, at any time.

We are just as much opposed to increasing the force as my friend from Missouri; but we are informed by the proper officer of the Senate that it is absolutely necessary in this case, and the committee have fully considered it and concluded that it is necessary. We have put the salary at the very lowest rate, that of a messenger, it being only $1,440. I submit the matter to the Senate and abide their judgment. I ask a vote upon the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that what may be the practice of the House of Representatives throws a great deal of light upon this topic. It is just possible that the House of Representatives, having come down from a corrupt republican administration, as it is sometimes called, found itself with a large excess, an unnecessary number, of officers about the library; and then it might be said—although that would not be respectful, and so I will not say it—that it would require more librarians in the lower branch of Congress than in the upper one for a great many reasons; so I think we may dismiss any comparison between the House and the Senate, because there is not any common test.

Now, how does this matter stand? Down to the 4th of March, 1879, about a year ago, when the books were about as numerous as they are now, there was no difficulty with the librarian that the Senate then had in getting a book that was there on a moment's notice. The books were so systematized, and classified, and arranged, and catalogued, and indexed, and all means of instant reference to books and documents were so perfect, that the thing went on without the slightest difficulty that ever I heard of. If other gentlemen were unfortunate in getting books or documents that they wanted, I was not, and I of course had very frequent occasion to send for them.

This I suppose is one of the fruits, speaking seriously, of the change of experienced and valuable officers of this body, depending upon political considerations. Without any disrespect to the present gentleman in charge there, no matter how accomplished and intelligent he may be, no matter how fit he may be to be a Senator, or a judge, or a governor, or whatever may be the greatest and best office in the country, it was not to be expected that until after some years, when he gets the run of the thing, he could do as well as his predecessor, all other things being equal. That is perfectly true; and so I am not blaming him; but it is one of the consequences, if this thing is necessary at all, of departing from the time-honored usage of the Senate about such matters. Of course those who dance must pay the fiddler; but how much it will add to the advantage of Senators to have two new men instead of one, I do not quite know.

I do not think myself that there will be any great difficulty now (except the intrinsic one that I have spoken of and that adding one more will not help an atom) in getting books. If the librarian comes to his place at nine o'clock in the morning, as some Senators are obliged to do, to attend to his business, in a little while he can get so accustomed to the arrangement and knowledge of where the books are that he will get on famously; but if the office is to be considered as a kind of honorable sinecure, or one that is only to be visited from twelve o'clock, when the session of the Senate begins, down to four o'clock, when it adjourns, and then the gentleman in charge understands that his work is done and that he has no other duty or responsibility until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, then it will not get on very well. But how adding another man, which was never found necessary before when everything went well only a year ago, comes now to be suddenly necessary, I confess I cannot understand. The increase of books has not been great in the last year plainly.

That is all I wish to say. Of course I do not expect to prevent the passage of this unnecessary resolution, as I think it is. It having been reported by a responsible committee, undoubtedly a majority of the Senate will agree to it. I only wished to put in my humble objection to this method of increasing the force of the Senate.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Before proceeding further with this matter the Chair would like to have the point of order involved in it settled by the Senate, as the question is liable to arise any morning. The Chair never supposed that the Anthony rule overruled the eighth standing rule of the Senate, which provides that—

If any portion of the morning hour shall remain after the call for resolutions, the presiding officer shall lay before the Senate in their order resolutions and concurrent resolutions introduced on any prior day, and the same may be proceeded with, but not beyond the expiration of the morning hour, unless by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

What is known as the Anthony rule provides:

That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day the Senate will proceed, &c.—

Terminating in these words:

And this order shall commence immediately after the call for concurrent and other resolutions, and shall take precedence of the unfinished business and other special orders.

If the construction to be placed upon this were that immediately after the call simply for the presentation of concurrent and other resolutions the Anthony rule attaches, then there will never be any time whatever for the consideration of the Calendar of concurrent and other resolutions; it can never be considered except by unanimous consent. The Chair supposes that the rules should be construed together, that they may operate harmoniously, and that the standing rule of the Senate should stand, leaving the resolution of the Senate known as the Anthony rule to operate in subordination to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then would it not be the duty of the Chair to call the resolutions in their order upon the Calendar, and not have them taken up on the suggestion of Senators?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It would be if the point were made, as a matter of course. That point never has been insisted upon. If any Senator makes that point the resolutions must be called in their order.

Mr. CONKLING. I had supposed that the one rule meant that concurrent and other resolutions were to be called as petitions and memorials are called, the rule there referring to the introduction of concurrent and other resolutions. Then I had supposed that a resolution lying on the table the Senate might proceed to consider, before entering upon business under the Anthony rule, by a motion, if a majority of the Senate should so decide. But the Senator from Georgia called for this resolution, and then without a vote of the Senate it was deemed in order. It was only to that point that I ventured to make my suggestion. I supposed that if "concurrent and other resolutions" which have lain over are called for at any stage, they should be taken up in their order, being on the Calendar; and I did not suppose that it was within the power of the Senator from Georgia, or any other Senator, to rise and call up, merely upon his individual statement, a resolution which had lain over, and make it in order by that process.

Mr. ANTHONY and Mr. HILL, of Georgia, addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to have the views of Senators upon this question and have the practice settled, as this question may arise any morning.

Mr. ANTHONY. It seems to me that if the special rule does not override the standing rule, it is inoperative altogether, because by the standing rule the unfinished business has to come up at one o'clock. The special rule provides that "this order shall commence immediately after the call for concurrent and other resolutions, and shall take precedence of the unfinished business and other special orders." It certainly overrides the standing rule in taking precedence of the unfinished business. This is merely a temporary order to last only until the Calendar is concluded. I do not know but that resolutions could be called up in their order under this rule. It provides for the consideration of the Calendar, and the resolutions are upon the Calendar. I do not see that the resolutions might not be properly called up before the bills. Although of course the special rule should be construed in harmony with the standing rules, yet when there is a direct contradiction between them it seems to me that the latest expression of the will of the Senate should prevail. I make this suggestion with great respect to the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator permit the Chair to inquire of him then, when may the Calendar of concurrent and other resolutions be considered?

Mr. ANTHONY. I say I do not see why the resolutions should not commence the call when this order prevails; but at all events, if they do not as has not been the habit, when the Calendar is completed then this rule ceases to operate, and we go back upon the old rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is known as the Anthony rule relates only to bills, and does not affect resolutions at all.

Mr. FERRY. If the Senator from Rhode Island will allow me, I will suggest that the Calendar would be reached after the morning hour expires, in the absence of a special order or unfinished business, so that there would be no prohibition to going to bills and resolutions on the Calendar; the special rule would simply apply for the morning hour. It strikes me, with due deference to the ruling of the Chair, that as the Anthony rule has been adopted to facilitate business, it overrides any rule that is in conflict with it; otherwise there is no force to the rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate in this form: Does what is known as the Anthony rule supersede that part of the eighth standing rule of the Senate which provides that—

If any portion of the morning hour shall remain after the call for resolutions, the presiding officer shall lay before the Senate, in their order, resolutions and concurrent resolutions introduced on any prior day.

As many as favor that proposition will say "ay;" those opposed "no," [putting the question.] The ayes have it.

Mr. CONKLING. Then the resolution is not before the Senate.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Do I understand that the resolution is now before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the expression of the Senate the Chair would rule not.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Then I move to postpone the Calendar and take up the resolution. Let us dispose of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia moves to postpone the pending and prior orders for the purpose indicated by him. First, will the Senate postpone the pending orders?

Mr. ANTHONY. Can that be done by a majority vote?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that it may.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 24, noes 13; no quorum voting.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is evidently a quorum present.

Mr. INGALLS. Let us have another division.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It is hardly worth while to call the yeas and nays; that would take time. I think if the Chair will take another division there will be a quorum voting.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question again on the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

The question being again put, there were on a division—ayes 30, noes 15.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Prior orders are postponed. The Senator from Georgia now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution which has been read.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution reported by Mr. HILL, of Georgia, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President, it is a fact that for a number of years previous to this session and probably during this session the number of employés of the Senate has been increased gradually. When you compare 1860 with the present time, I think the employés are now about double what they were in 1860. At this session there has been some increase, the Senate knows why. I believe the only increase that has taken place during this session has been to accommodate our friends on the opposite side of the Chamber.

So far as the Contingent Expenses Committee, of which I am a member, is concerned, I believe that not a single appointment has been recommended by that committee other than this one at this session; indeed the number of employés of the Senate as a whole has been to some extent reduced by the action of the committee and the concurrence of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

In this particular case, after considering the subject pretty thoroughly and looking into it closely, the Committee on Contingent Expenses came to the conclusion that this assistant librarian ought to be appointed for this reason especially: If the librarian is sick or out of his place from any cause whatever, there is no one to take charge of the library except a colored messenger, who is a very good man I have no doubt. It does not make any difference whether he is a colored man or a white man; but there is only a messenger there; and if from any cause whatever the librarian has to be away, from sickness or otherwise, there is no one in the library who has charge of the books or who can give a book or send a book to any Senator who asks for it. When the question was considered it was believed by the Committee on Contingent Expenses that it was absolutely necessary in this case, though we hope to be able at the end of the session, when things are perfected that are now thought of by the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Secretary, to decrease the gross number of employes. I believe such will be the result.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia who reported this resolution remarked that there was but one white man about the library, and then he said something about a black man or black men—

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Allow me, I said nothing about a white man or black man. I do not think those words were used by me. I said there was one librarian who had no assistant but one laborer. Somebody in his seat said, "and he a colored man," of course to show, I supposed, the difference between the condition of the Senate and the House. I do not suppose the gentleman who made that suggestion to me wanted to raise the question of white or black in this connection. I am sure I did not.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Georgia does not surprise me, I overheard that he does surprise another Senator, by rising here and declaring that he did not say anything about a white man or black man. I have no doubt that the Senator is sincere in his denial; and yet the whole Senate heard him, if it listened, state that there was one librarian and a laborer who was a black man, that there was only one white man in the library. That the Senator said; and I will refer him to the RECORD when it comes to be printed.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will say to the Senator that when I was making my remarks I did not know whether the laborer was a white man or a black man, a colored man, or what, but I remarked that there was but one officer there and he was the librarian and that there was one laborer. Somebody remarked "and he a colored man." I may have repeated it and I may have said there was then a white man because for the first time I had that information. Why the Senator from New York should desire to make the point, I do not know. I can only say that when I reported the resolution I did not know the color of anybody connected with the library.

Mr. CONKLING. It is just possible that if the Senator from Georgia will allow the Senator who has the floor to make the remark he rose to make, he will find out the point. And as to what the Senator said, I refer him to the RECORD; I do not want to have any question of recollection with the Senator from Georgia.

I rose to say that before the 4th of March, 1879, when this Senate library was managed as has been I think truly stated by the Senator from Vermont, there was a colored man in the library who was soon afterward displaced. He was a black man, rather unusually black. I knew him well and know him well now. He was a thoroughly intelligent man, and the Senate lost nothing from his color, in respect of his service. He knew where the books were to be found and could produce them promptly when called for. He was displaced; and whatever may be the color of those who have come since, I take occasion to say not only that while this man was there the library of the Senate was diligently and sufficiently administered, but that this man was remarkably intelligent, faithful, and prompt in his ministrations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire simply to say that the reasons given for this increase of force are not to my mind at all satisfactory. I do not believe that it is the duty of the Government, of the tax-payers of the country, to provide in advance a man to wait in the library of the Senate to do duty there in the event of the sickness or the absence of the librarian, or in the event that some member of his family should be sick and he should be called away. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I do not think there is any sufficient justification for this increase.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution having been twice read, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, if this resolution is to pass, I move to amend it by inserting after the words "assistant librarian" the words "who shall attend upon the floor of the Senate during its legislative sessions as directed by the Library Committee of the Senate."

The Senate ought to have a small collection of books—certainly the RECORD and the Globe, the debates of the Senate and the House, and the Journals of the Senate and House—present upon the floor, with the constant attendance during the ordinary legislative sessions of the Senate of a person who is skillful enough to find any subject or matter or speech which is required to be referred to in the course of debate. Any member of the Senate who has been a member of the other House will agree that that arrangement in the House is one of the most convenient things for facilitating the business done there which is provided. There is a little library containing some four or five hundred volumes only, but containing a set of the congressional debates and journals and the reports of the Supreme Court of the United States, which can be reached at half a minute's notice if any member of the House during his speech desires to refer to any such thing. To get the same convenience here we have to send by a page to the Senate library, somewhere in the inaccessible recesses of the upper story.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator repeat his amendment? Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts on reflection that he ought not to offer that amendment. The object we have in having an assistant librarian will be largely defeated by it, I fear.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator does not observe that my amendment gives the Library Committee of the Senate the power to direct this to be done as they shall deem the convenience of the Senate requires. It does not make an absolute obligation for this person always to be here. My amendment is "who shall attend upon the floor of the Senate during its legislative sessions as directed by the Library Committee of the Senate."

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Say "if directed."

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Or "when directed." I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that there is a resolution now which has been referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, upon which we have not acted, the very purpose of which is to accomplish what he proposes, and more. It is to supply to the Senate an officer, similar to the one well known in the House, who is said to be very useful there. We have not yet acted upon that resolution, there is such an aversion to increasing the force.

Mr. HOAR. What is this man to do? The only statement I have heard of any duty or any necessity for this additional employe is that an officer who has charge of the library and who has messengers now, at least one, under his control, should have some skillful person there if his family happen to be sick or he happens to be sick himself—

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I cannot hear the Senator very well.

Mr. HOAR. The only suggestion of a duty for this officer which has been made in my hearing—I did not hear all that the Senator from Georgia said—is that the present librarian may have, if he happens to be sick hereafter or his family happen to be sick, somebody to do his duties in his absence. What this man is to do when the present librarian of the Senate is attending to his duties, as he is presumed to be most of the time, has not been suggested.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. The necessities for this officer were laid before the committee in a letter from the Secretary of the Senate in which he stated that if on account of sickness of the librarian or sickness in his family or from any cause he was required to be absent, the business is now stopped.

Mr. HOAR. What is this man to do if the librarian or his family are not sick?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. He is to aid the librarian. He is to be assistant librarian.

Mr. HOAR. Has the librarian any need of such an officer when he is there himself?

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. We have stated that he does need him, I was going on to say, not only when the librarian is absent, but the Secretary states that the volume of business of the Senate and of the library has so increased that this assistant is necessary often even when the librarian himself is there, and is needed in the library.

Now, I say to the Senator that we are considering in committee the very measure he proposes to accomplish by his amendment to this resolution, and I would prefer that he should not encumber this resolution with it. This officer is declared by the Secretary of the Senate to be necessary in the library, not only when the librarian is not there—for when the librarian is not there his presence is indispensable—but when the librarian is there he frequently needs this assistant, and it is important that he should be in the library. I trust therefore that the Senator from Massachusetts will not press the amendment. I think it can be reached in another way.

Mr. DAWES. The need of some such arrangement as is suggested by my colleague, I think, is so apparent that there cannot be any opposition to it when it is called to the attention of those Senators who have not experienced the convenience of the arrangement the other House has. I hope that some arrangement by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will be made for just such a sub-library as is suggested, and that is one reason for the appointment of this man.

I shall vote for this resolution, hoping that it will lead to such a result as has been suggested by my colleague. Even if it were not brought about by that means, still it will contribute very much to relieve us from the difficulty we experience in sending for the books and documents we need. While we have been debating this resolution two pages have come in with half a cart-load of reports that would be within reach of us if my colleague's idea were carried out, so that any Senator could go and get the particular book he wanted without any such trouble as that which I have witnessed while we have been debating this very resolution. All of that would have been saved; and an assistant librarian, such as they have in the House, is just what is needed for that purpose.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I shall adhere to my amendment, which simply authorizes the Library Committee, a committee composed of Senators, to direct this officer to be in attendance here, if they see fit. I do not think it is any answer to the obvious reasonableness and propriety of that suggestion to say that the Secretary of the Senate thinks this man may be wanted up-stairs when the family of the principal librarian are sick or when he is sick himself. In such a case the application would be made to the Library Committee, and they would relieve the man from his attendance.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it is obvious that this amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts cannot be of any practical value until we can have some room to store the library for which this assistant librarian is to be authorized.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Vermont will pardon me—

Mr. MORRILL. Allow me to finish what I have to say. I desire to say that until the number of committees of this body shall be largely reduced, there is not any other room but the Marble Room where this library could be accommodated. The special and other committees of this body have been so multiplied that it is impossible now to furnish all with committee-rooms, and I know of no place, unless it is the Marble Room, where this library could be put.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask my friend from Vermont, my colleague upon the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, if there is not precisely the same relative room in the Senate that there is in the House, exactly the same place to put it here that there is to put it in the House, where it is accessible to every member, and during any debate there any member goes in while any one is speaking and finds the book he wants and brings it out himself.

Mr. MORRILL. Of course if you choose to curtail the amount of lobby and ante-rooms, a library of these books could be placed in one of the ante-rooms; but until that is done I do not see that there is any practical use for this assistant librarian. Certainly he could not move from this Chamber to the present library with any more expedition than one of our pages. I shall therefore vote against the whole proposition.

Mr. HOAR. Such a collection of books as I suggest will be amply accommodated at the end of either of the cloak rooms against the wall which separates them from the main entrance to the Senate Chamber. It is only a few shelves that are necessary for that purpose; there is plenty of room. Putting up shelves of eight or ten inches in depth will answer the purpose; and the object of having a librarian present is that he may receive personal directions from Senators who desire to have a particular passage in a debate found promptly instead of having to be communicated with by a page.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let us hear the resolution as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint an assistant librarian for the Senate, who shall attend upon the floor of the Senate during its legislative sessions as directed by the Committee on the Library, at a salary of $1,440 per annum, payable monthly, being the same amount of salary paid to assistant librarians of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KERNAN. I cannot concur in voting for this additional officer, and I simply want to state in one word why. In my judgment a librarian, with an intelligent man to aid him, is all that is necessary. With this force we have got along heretofore, and I think we can hereafter.

Mr. CARPENTER. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the words "being the same amount of salary paid to assistant librarians of the House of Representatives." I do not want it to appear that we are doing this because the House have done it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I have no objection to striking that out. The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Shall the resolution be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 22; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1153) to restore to the public domain a part of the military reservation known as the Fort Ripley reservation, in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 1229) to authorize and direct the Commissioner of Agriculture to attend, in person or by deputy, the international sheep and wool show, to be held in the Centennial buildings, Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, in September, A. D. 1880, and to make a full and complete report of the same, and for other purposes.

NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will now proceed with the call of the Calendar of General Orders under the standing order of the day.

The bill (S. No. 1282) to incorporate the National Educational Association was announced as being first in order upon the Calendar, and its consideration was resumed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall this bill be engrossed for a third reading?

Mr. COCKRELL. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President—

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to have the bill as amended read before we vote. I have been absent during the course of the debate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill as amended will be reported, and then the Chair will recognize the Senator from Wisconsin.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, if there is any subject over which Congress ought to be careful in its legislation, it is in creating corporations. Of all the corporations proposed to be created, so far as I know or ever heard of, I think the one authorized by this bill is the most remarkable.

The first section names a great many persons and says they shall be a corporation, with a certain name, "in the District of Columbia, for the purpose of collecting and diffusing information in regard to education in the United States, and for no other purpose." There is no doubt that Congress has full power, under that clause of the Constitution which gives it exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia, to do anything it pleases to promote education in this District. It has the same power that a State Legislature has over the same subject in the State. But the bill shows upon its face that the location of the corporation is put in the District of Columbia for a blind, and that the purpose of the corporation is to carry on a business not connected with the District of Columbia, and so the encroachment on the Constitution is the more dangerous because it is dishonest. If it were proposed by Congress to establish a corporation of the United States to attend to education in New York, Massachusetts, or any other State, I presume every one would concede that it was unconstitutional. No matter how important the subject of education may be, it is not a subject committed to this Government, and unless committed by express words or by reasonable implication we have no control over it, we have no right to further it, to hinder it, or to do anything whatever in regard to it. To establish a corporation, therefore, which is to take charge of or do anything whatever in connection with education in the States, is entirely beyond our jurisdiction.

Nor does it make any difference that the corporation is located, or, as a lawyer might say, that it has its habitat, in the District of Columbia, if its purpose and object is one not given to us by the Constitution. If this read "for the purpose of collecting and diffusing information in regard to education in the District of Columbia," no matter what might be said in regard to other provisions of the bill, it would be clearly within our power, so far as that is a subject of legislation.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator does not pretend that that was the construction given to the Constitution by its own framers?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not pretend anything about it; I assert that it was and is the construction given to it by all good lawyers.

Mr. BLAINE. On what ground, then, did General Washington recommend the establishment of a national university for the diffusion of education and knowledge?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not know that the framers of the Constitution had anything to do with that recommendation of General Washington.

Mr. BLAINE. He was one of the framers, a pretty large framer. He had a pretty large hand in it, and he was surrounded by the men who framed it—

Mr. CARPENTER. I will get through in a moment, if you please, and then give you the floor.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want it.

Mr. CARPENTER. I would rather the Senator would make his speech on his own account than on mine.

The purpose of this bill is set out in the bill itself. It is "to collect and diffuse information in regard to education," not in the District of Columbia, but in the United States. Now, precisely what is meant by "collecting and diffusing information in regard to education," I do not understand. These corporations are not to educate anybody; they are not to educate pupils; they are not to educate teachers. They are "to collect and diffuse information in regard to education." The only question which I should suppose was fairly committed to this corporation under that provision—and a very important, though not very difficult question—is: Is education a good thing to have? That would be “information in regard to education.” It would not educate anybody, because everybody knows that much already.

The second section is that they may hold real estate in the District of Columbia. Why is that restriction that they shall hold real estate in the District of Columbia? If we have power to establish a national college, a national university, why restrict them to property in the District of Columbia? Is it not apparent from the very phraseology of this bill that it is an attempt on the part of its friends to crowd upon the Constitution, to pretend to locate the corporation in the District of Columbia and to give it jurisdiction and powers throughout the United States and that on a subject not committed to the Federal Government?

If it were in regard to commerce or in regard to any other Federal subject, there would be no objection; but the subject of education is as much excluded from the powers of Congress as the subject of religion. One is expressly excluded, and the other is excluded by the tenth amendment to the Constitution which says we shall have no powers except those which are granted by the instrument; and when you pass an act looking to education in the States you have no warrant for it except to say that it will be useful to do it. Well, if Congress has power to pass any law which it believes would be useful in its operations to the people of the United States, there is an end of the question and there is an end of the restrictions which the Constitution places upon our power.

The third section provides “that twenty-five members of the National Educational Association shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.” The second section provides that they may make their own constitution, by-laws, &c. The only specific duty imposed upon this corporation is enough to make a practical man stagger:

And whenever called upon by any department of the Government shall investigate and report upon any educational subject.

And considering that nothing that is very valuable is obtained in this world for nothing, as a practical commentary upon this bill, its framers add to this clause the words: “without compensation for such services.” If anybody supposes that this Government is to be enlightened by a corporation which is to do this without pay then, I am satisfied that the millennium has come or is fast coming and will soon come after this bill becomes a law.

Indeed, Mr. President, in every view of it that I can take, the bill in the first place is unconstitutional, totally beyond our power to pass, and in the next place it is a burlesque upon the charter of a corporation.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him whether the act founding the Smithsonian Institution is unconstitutional?

Mr. CARPENTER. I have not any particular opinion on that subject, never having thought of it or investigated it.

Mr. HOAR. It occurred to me that possibly in forming the opinion he has now expressed the Senator might have considered that question.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is a very easy thing to justify any action that Congress wants to take, if it is a sufficient justification to say that Congress has done such a thing. I do not know where would be the limit of our power if we can first do a thing and then the next day justify doing it because we did it the day before.

As to the constitutionality of the bill in regard to the Smithsonian Institution, I have nothing to say. I have had no connection with that subject; I never thought of it, and never examined it, and have no opinion to express upon it. If I had any, I should give it cheerfully. But as to this bill, which on its very face declares that this corporation, although to be located in the District of Columbia, is for the national interest of education—education throughout the United States—I pronounce it unconstitutional.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired. The Senate proceeds to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senate will consent to take the vote upon this bill. I do not desire to discuss it in the least.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there unanimous consent that this bill be further considered at this time?

Mr. WHYTE. Regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded, which is the consideration of the unfinished business.

GENEVA AWARD FUND.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 1194) for reviving and continuing the court of commissioners of Alabama claims, and for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 17th instant.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, the tribunal of arbitration, under the treaty of Washington, awarded $15,500,000 as compensation for the liabilities incurred by Great Britain for injuries committed by rebel cruisers. The amount of this award was paid by Great Britain to the Government of the United States. The tribunal decided that Great Britain was in fault, and that by the law of nations she was liable to make compensation for the property of American citizens destroyed by the cruisers Alabama and Florida and their tenders, and the Shenandoah after she left the port of Melbourne.

As is well known, claims to a large amount owned by uninsured parties, whose vessels or merchandise had been captured or destroyed by these cruisers, were presented to and considered and allowed by the tribunal. There is no dispute that these claims constituted a part of the damages awarded; and without serious opposition they have been paid by the United States, out of the money awarded and received, to the uninsured claimants.

The claims of the insurers who had insured vessels and cargoes, which were destroyed by the three cruisers, against war risks, and paid the insurance to the owners, were also presented to the tribunal. These claims were allowed by the tribunal, and made a part of the amount awarded against Great Britain. These insurers have not received anything on account of their claims; and one of the important questions involved in the measure under consideration is whether these insurers of vessels and cargoes destroyed by the three cruisers, who paid the owners as upon a total loss, are entitled to receive the amount they paid out of this money awarded against and paid by Great Britain to the United States Government.

The majority of the committee report in favor of providing for the payment out of this money of the claims of the insurers to the amounts paid by them to the owners on account of the vessels and cargoes destroyed by the three cruisers for which Great Britain was held liable.

I am of the opinion that these insurers stand precisely in the shoes, occupy the position as to the money awarded which the insured owners would have occupied had they not been insured. If this be so, the insurers have a legal right to the payment of their claims out of this fund as clear as that of the uninsured owners who have been paid. I admit they have not a legal remedy to coerce the United States to pay over the money to them, but I insist that they occupy a position which by the rules of law applicable to the facts of the case give them a right to payment of their claims out of the fund before any portion of it is distributed to claimants whose claims were rejected as invalid by the tribunal which made the award.

Sir, I insist that where property insured is damaged, captured, or destroyed, and the insurer pays the insured owner as for a “total loss,” the insurer is by law placed in the exact position he would occupy had the insured owner assigned by the most perfect assignment to him the property and all chances and rights of obtaining remuneration or indemnity for the loss. This is the law in England, and this is the law in this country, and it has been settled by the adjudications in both countries for years.

I beg leave to call the attention of Senators to the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the case of Comegys vs. Vasse, found in 1 Peters, page 193. This case was decided in 1828. I will first read the head-note by the reporter:

The law gives to the act of abandonment to underwriters, when accepted, all the effects which the most accurately drawn assignment would accomplish. The underwriter then stands in the place of the insured, and becomes legally entitled to all that can be recovered from destruction.

I know it is claimed that this means only that which can be recovered from the property or the proceeds of the property; but I will show that this court and other courts mean no such thing. Mr. Justice Story, who delivered the opinion in this case, at page 214, says:

By the act of abandonment, the insured renounces and yields up to the underwriter all his right, title, and claims, to what may be saved; and leaves it to him to make the most of it, for his own benefit. The underwriter then stands in the place of the insured, and becomes legally entitled to all that can be rescued from destruction. This is the language of the elementary writers, and is fully borne out by Mr. Marshall and Mr. Park, in their treatises on insurance. (Marshall on Insurance, book 1, article 14; Park on Insurance, chapter 9, pages 238, 279.)

“Where,” says Mr. Marshall, “as in case of capture, the thing insured, and every part of it, is completely gone out of the power of the insured, it is just and proper that he should recover at once, as for a total loss, and leave the spes recuperandi to the insurer, who will have the benefit of a recapture, or of any other accident, by which the thing may be recovered.” Mr. Park uses equally strong language; he says “the insured has a right to call upon the underwriter for a total loss, and, of course, to abandon as soon as he hears of such a calamity having happened; his claim to an indemnity not being at all suspended by the chance of a future recovery of part of the property lost; because by the abandonment that chance devolves upon the underwriters.” It is very clear, that neither of these learned writers meant to confine these remarks to cases where the specific property itself, or its proceeds, were restored; for the whole current of their reasoning, in the context, goes to show that whatever may be afterward recovered or received, whether in the course of judicial proceedings or otherwise, as a compensation for the loss, belongs to the underwriters.

I read further what was decided in this case in 1 Peters from the head-note by the reporter:

It is clear, that the right to compensation for damages and injuries, to which citizens of the United States were entitled, and which, under the treaty with Spain, were to be the subjects of compensation, passed by abandonment to the underwriters upon property, which had been seized or captured.

The right to indemnity for an unjust capture, on the sovereign; whether remediable in his own courts, or by his own extraordinary interposition, or grants upon private petition, or upon public negotiation; is a right attached to the ownership of the property itself, and passes by cession to the account of the ultimate sufferer; and is afterward assignable to the person to whom it had been ceded.

The language of the court in its opinion in the case is substantially what is embodied in the head-notes, that every right or chance of indemnity against the loss, whether from the property or its proceeds, or from a foreign government by negotiation, passes to the insurer who paid for the property captured or destroyed. And where, as in the case under consideration, the government of the party injured presented his claim to a foreign government alleged to be in fault for payment, and a tribunal is constituted by the two governments to decide upon the validity of the claim, and it is decided that the claim is well founded and the amount is paid by the government in default to the government of the party on whose behalf the claim was made, surely that government is legally and morally bound to pay over the money to the party who was the legal owner of the claim collected and on whose account it was paid.

By the act of 1874, Congress decided that the uninsured owners whose property was destroyed by the three cruisers were by law and justice entitled to payment out of this fund. By the same rules the insurers who paid owners of insured property destroyed are as matter of legal right entitled to payment from this fund.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Does the honorable Senator contend that there is a distinction between the case of a legal and an illegal capture? The case in 1 Peters was clearly a case of an illegal capture, as I understand.

Mr. KERNAN. That is a very long case; I have read it all through. All I ask of as good a lawyer as my friend from Florida is that he examine that case and the authorities therein cited, and he will be satisfied, I think, that the settled law is that where the citizen of one country by the omission to perform its duty according to the law of nations by a foreign government has suffered a direct loss by the destruction of his property, if his own government does what it rightfully may, calls on the foreign government to indemnify the citizen for the property destroyed and the foreign government responds by payment for the loss to the government of the citizen wronged, the latter or his legal representative is in law and equity the owner and entitled to receive from his government the money that is paid over. It was the right and duty of his government to present his claim. If it does so, and it is allowed and paid, his own government cannot rightfully then say to him, "We will keep this money, or give it to others." No, sir; it should be paid to those, whether uninsured owners of, or insurers who have paid for the property captured or destroyed, on account of whom the money was received from the foreign government.

In the case under consideration the United States Government presented the claim of the insurers who had paid for property destroyed; and also presented the claims of others to a tribunal which by treaty it was stipulated should give a final judgment on all the claims. That tribunal decided that Great Britain was liable for the destruction by these three cruisers of the property of citizens of the United States. The claims of the insurers of property destroyed which they had paid for were presented and proved before the tribunal; the counsel for Great Britain conceded these insurers were by law entitled to indemnity and payment if the owners would have been had they not been insured. The American Government at the same time presented the claims of the war-premium claimants to the tribunal and urged their validity. But the tribunal decided expressly that Great Britain was not liable by the law of nations for these claims, these indirect losses, and "excluded them," in the language of the record, from examination and computation in arriving at the sum awarded. I say it will not do for our Government to receive the money under that award, to take the value of the property destroyed, claimed by and allowed on account of uninsured owners, and claimed by and allowed on account of insurers who had paid for it to the insured owners, and then turn round and say to the insurers "we will not pay any of this money to you, although we have received it on account of and for your claims; but we will give it to war-premium claimants" who were held by the tribunal to have no valid claim against Great Britain, and on account of whose claims not a penny was included in the sum awarded and paid to the United States Government.

Of course every lawyer in this country has great respect for the opinion of Chancellor Kent. Chancellor Kent, in the third volume of his Commentaries, at page 319, says:

In case of abandonment as for a total loss the insurer stands in the place of the insured and takes the subject to himself with all the chances of recovery and indemnity.

This is from a modern edition, the twelfth. If gentlemen will look at the notes to that edition they will find the cases showing a uniform current of decisions in accordance with this settled rule of law. I also call attention to the statement of the law on this subject by Mr. Webster, a great lawyer. In discussing the very questions which we have under consideration he said:

There is no more universal maxim of law and justice throughout the civilized and commercial world than that an underwriter who has paid a loss on ship or merchandise to the owner is entitled to whatever may be received from the property. His right accrues by the very act of payment. And if the property or its proceeds be afterward recovered, in whole or in part, whether the recovery be from the sea, from captors, or from the justice of foreign states, such recovery is for the benefit of the underwriter.

Now, let it be borne in mind that I do not dispute that there is power in the Government of the United States to say "We will pay this just as we please and to what party we please; we will not give it to the parties whose claims we presented and urged and which were allowed and paid." But I deny that the United States Government can rightfully do this. No gentleman, in my opinion, can examine the case and doubt that the amount of the award was based on an allowance by the tribunal of the claims of the individual owners of property which was uninsured and destroyed by the three cruisers and the claims of the underwriters who had insured property destroyed by these cruisers and paid the owners for it. Therefore I say, no matter whether the insurers could have sued Great Britain or not or whether they had any sort of proceeding against her to enforce payment or not, the United States Government claimed that she was in fault; that she contributed to these losses by neglecting her duty as a neutral to the United States which were at war with the Confederate States; that she permitted their cruisers to be fitted out in her harbors, and allowed them to go forth upon the ocean to commit these depredations. We claimed that she was liable by the law of nations to satisfy not only the wrongs done the United States as a government by the destruction of its property by these cruisers, but that she was bound to pay the losses which fell upon our citizens by the destruction of their property by these cruisers. Great Britain was bound to do a duty which she did not perform. The tribunal so held as to these three cruisers. But the tribunal allowed no damage and no award of money was made except for what was done by these three cruisers and the tenders of two of them. From 1862-'63 on, our Government assumed the responsibility of sending to the British government the claims for the losses of the uninsured and of the insurers who had paid the losses of their assured. The parties furnished claims for their losses in detail with the necessary evidence. Our Government called upon them to do so that they might be laid before the authorities of Great Britain for settlement and payment prior to the treaty, and before the tribunal after it was constituted for adjudication and payment. The United States Government in presenting these private claims of her citizens and insisting upon their payment was acting in the line of its duty to have justice done to its citizens who could look to it alone to enforce justice in their behalf from Great Britain. If the parties whose private claims were paid by Great Britain to the Government of the United States do not receive the money, they do not get justice. Which government is in fault? Certainly not that of Great Britain.

I hold in my hand a circular issued in 1865 by the Secretary of State of the United States calling upon all citizens who had been injured by the action of foreign governments to present their claims. It says among other things:

It is proper that the interposition of this Government with the foreign government against which the claim is presented should be requested in express terms, to avoid a possible objection to the jurisdiction of a future commission on the ground of the generality of the claim.

The circular gives rules where vessels were destroyed or their cargoes, as to the character of evidence that ought to be furnished. Thereafter, in 1871, the treaty was made under which the Geneva tribunal was organized to settle all the claims public and private, public claims of the United States Government and private claims of individuals. The State Department sent out another circular in 1871 after the treaty was made, quoting a part of the language of the treaty which I will read, that we may see whether we, the United States Government, can rightfully or with honor now turn around upon the parties who did furnish their claims and put them in the hands of the Government to be presented to the tribunal, whether this Government can now, after the claims have been presented and have been adjudicated to be valid claims against Great Britain by the law of nations, and have been included in the amount of the award which has been paid over, say "we will not pay the money to you insurers of property destroyed and paid for by you and whose claims were allowed and paid to us; we will not pay you, you are rich—you made money in your business as insurers;" but we will use the money to pay claims of other parties which Great Britain by the tribunal was held not to be liable for, and which claims the tribunal rejected. I ask the Secretary to read the circular which I send to the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September —, 1871.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the — instant and its inclosures.

In reply, I inclose a copy of the treaty concluded with Great Britain on the 8th of May last and general instructions as to the proof of claims prepared for the use of claimants in the absence of rules by the tribunal which may pass upon the claims.

In the absence of rules and in anticipation of the action of the tribunal, this Department cannot assume to determine what claims it may or may not be proper to prefer under the first eleven articles of the treaty, nor to direct what form or extent of proof will be necessary to establish them, nor the effect of insurance upon the question of right to compensation. It will present to the tribunal at Geneva, to be taken into account in estimating the sum to be paid to the United States, "all" claims growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims," which may be presented to the Department in time to enable it to do so. Persons desiring to lodge claims in the Department for that purpose are requested to do so without delay, in such form and sustained by such proofs as they may be advised or think proper to rest their claims upon, as the time for presenting the case of the United States expires on the 16th day of December next.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HAMILTON FISH,
Secretary.

Mr. KERNAN. You will observe that claimants are called upon, invited, notified to present claims to the Secretary of State after this treaty was made. What claims? In the language of the treaty, as quoted in this circular—

All claims growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels which have given rise to the claims generically known as the Alabama claims.

And the Government, in its capacity as the Government of the United States, had received from its citizens the claims of uninsured owners of property destroyed, and of insurers of property destroyed which they had paid for to the owners. How were these claims treated by our Government? As claims that the Government was to exact payment of, and then put the money in the Treasury and not pay it over to the claimants? No, sir; they were treated as claims which our Government had a right to exact from Great Britain on account of property destroyed by the cruisers, for the benefit of uninsured owners and of insurers who had paid for that which they had insured.

The President of the United States, in his message of December 5, 1870, before the treaty, recommended to Congress that there should be a settlement made with the owners of these claims. His language is:

So that the Government shall have the ownership of the private claims, as well as the responsible control of all the demands against Great Britain.

Our Government had claims in her own right; there were also private claims; and the President, to facilitate negotiations, suggested that the Government should buy the private claims, settle with the owners of them, and get all the claims in its own hands as owner, so that the Government could deal with the government of Great Britain as owner of them all; and yet now it is said, and said with great sincerity I doubt not, that the Government can do with this money just as it pleases. I admit it can as a matter of mere power, for the Government cannot be prosecuted in a court except by its own consent. Congress did not see fit to purchase these claims of the owners. On the contrary, it invited its citizens to send them in that they might be urged for payment by Great Britain. Payment for whom? Payment through the Government to the parties who actually and legally owned the claims.

Now, I ask the attention of Senators to what our agent and counsel did before the tribunal. You will find what I refer to in the first volume of the papers relating to this transaction at Geneva. At the close of the case made for the United States by their counsel, an argument of great clearness and power, at page 185, top-paging, the counsel say—what?

The claims as stated by the American commissioners may be classified as follows:

1. The claims for direct losses growing out of the destruction of vessels and their cargoes by the insurgent cruisers.

That is one class. That would include cases where a United States Government vessel or property was destroyed by the cruisers; also claims by uninsured owners of property destroyed by the cruisers, and also the claims of insurers, underwriters who had paid the owners for their property which had been insured and destroyed by the cruisers.

What were the other classes? Because I wish to show what the tribunal awarded upon and what were the claims rejected and excluded. The other claims presented by the United States to the tribunal were, (I read from the same page above referred to:)

2. The national expenditures in the pursuit of those cruisers.
3. The loss in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag.
4. The enhanced payments of insurance.
5. The prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion.

The above fourth class covers what are called claims for war premiums—claims of parties who insured their property against the war risks, but whose property was not destroyed or captured by the cruisers.

The representatives of our Government presented these claims. They stated that they furnished the evidence in all its detail of the various claims, and they asked an award in gross or of a round sum; and on what ground did they ask this? Was there any idea suggested that the money which was awarded in the gross sum for the destruction of a vessel was to be put into the Treasury and kept? Not at all; they stated to the tribunal why they made this request. I read from the printed case. They there say that—

They earnestly hope that the tribunal will exercise the power conferred upon it to award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain to the United States.

For the treaty provided that the tribunal might, if it held Great Britain liable, award the amount to be paid in gross, or send it to a board of assessors to ascertain and report the amount in detail. Our commissioner asked them earnestly to award a sum in gross to the United States to cover all the claims allowed; and they state the reason. I continue from the printed case:

The injuries of which the United States complain were committed many years since. The original wrongs to the sufferers by the acts of the insurgent cruisers have been increased by the delay in making reparation. It will be unjust to impose further delay and the expense of presenting claims to another tribunal if the evidence which the United States have the honor to present for the consideration of these arbitrators shall prove to be sufficient to enable them to determine what sum in gross would be a just compensation to the United States for the injuries and losses of which they complain.

There were two classes of claims, those which belonged to the Government for the destruction of any property owned by the Government, and also the private claims, where they say the original wrong to the sufferers by the act of the cruisers was enhanced very much by the long delay and that it was a hardship to make them wait any longer.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator allow me a question? I desire to know whether he thinks a citizen of one country can have any claim against another political power, or even against his own sovereign, for a capture of his property on the high seas according to the law of nations?

Mr. KERNAN. My notion is that an act of war gives the citizen no right; but the United States and Great Britain in this whole matter proceeded upon the theory that the latter had committed no act of war against the United States. She would not have conceded that she was a belligerent of ours and paid damages. The whole matter proceeds on the assumption that she was a neutral, that she neglected certain duties she as a neutral owed us, we being a belligerent engaged in war with others, and that her neglect enabled the other belligerent power to do the act of war for which we could have no reparation by the law of nations from this other belligerent. If my friend, who is able and whom I respect so much, and whose judgment I respect, will look into the arguments before the tribunal he will find that they were all based on duties of England as a neutral and her omission to fulfill them. I am not going to take time to argue with him, but if he will examine he will find that when England and France were at war in the last century England complained that the United States, which was a neutral, did not do its duty, and allowed cruisers to be fitted out and aided in our ports, and to escape and to be used as French cruisers, which preyed on British commerce. She claimed the United States were liable for the damages done by these French cruisers to the property of her citizens, and the treaty of 1794 made provision for ascertaining and paying these damages. This was done. Mr. Adams cites this to the British government in his letters about these claims before the treaty. The claim of Great Britain against the United States in 1794 was not for an act of war, but for our neglect of our duty as a neutral, she being at war with France. The position and claims of the United States out of which the treaty of 1871 arose were the same—Great Britain maintained against the United States in 1794—in each case the party complained of was a neutral and held responsible because she was a neutral.

When interrupted I was proceeding to show how our Government proceeded at Geneva. Ours is an honest, honorable Government, and does not mean to cheat anybody and get money by false pretenses. If you look at volume 7 of the Geneva papers, page 116, you will find we presented "claims on behalf of the Government of the United States." You will find among them claims for indemnity for prolonging the war, claims for loss by the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag. You will also find that our representatives made and laid before the tribunal a detailed statement of "expenses incurred by the United States in fitting out vessels to cruise for the Alabama, Florida, and other insurgent cruisers." These were claims made by the United States as a nation.

The tribunal decided that these claims could not be recovered. They were rejected. Our representatives also presented the claims of private parties. In this same volume 7, page 3, we find:

List of the claims filed with the Department of State, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels, which have given rise to the claims generally known as the Alabama claims.

Then follow to the end of the volume the claims of private parties—of the uninsured owners, of the insurers, and also at page cccxxiii, the "claims for increased war premiums, paid by owners to protect themselves against the capture of their property by the several insurgent cruisers," all presented on behalf of owners with no suggestion to any one that if we got the money the Government would not pay it to the parties in whose name and for the destruction of whose property it had urged this claim and received the award.

So it is plain and clear, I submit, that the United States Government presented these private claims of the uninsured owners and of the insurers who stood exactly where the owners would have stood if they had not been insured for and on behalf of these claimants. They were pressed as such upon the consideration of the tribunal, and not as claims owned by the United States. What did the tribunal hold? The tribunal held that none of the claims except those for direct losses embraced in the first class above mentioned could be allowed, and rejected those embraced in the other four classes. Early, before the tribunal entered upon the investigation of the details of claims, they rejected the third, fourth, and fifth classes, those for the loss of our commerce, for the war premiums, for the enhanced expenses of the war. They did, then, entertain the second class, which was for the national expenses in pursuing the cruisers; but you will find that afterward and before the award was agreed upon or made they excluded the second class entirely as they had the third, fourth, and fifth classes.

The question arose first as to the three following classes of claims presented by the representatives of the United States, namely:

- First, The losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag;
- Second, The enhanced payments of insurance; and
- Third, The prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion.

These are the classes of claims numbered above 3, 4, and 5.

The decision of the tribunal will be found in its proceedings in volume 4, pages 19 and 20, of Papers Relating to the Treaty of Washington. They there state as follows:

This being so, the arbitrators think it right to state that, after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation or computation of damages between nations, and should, upon such principles, be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there were no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon.

They excluded the war-premium claims. They did it when our counsel had urged everything they could in their favor. They adjourned over for a day or two; and thereupon, our commissioners having consulted this Government as to what should be done after the tribunal had stated what was their individual and collective judgment as to the law of nations, that these were not claims that could be allowed. Mr. Bancroft Davis stated as follows, (see same, volume 4, page 21:)

The declaration made by the tribunal, individually and collectively, respecting the claims presented by the United States for the award of the tribunal, for, first, the losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag; second, the enhanced payments of insurance; and third, the prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion, is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law involved.

The claims for war premiums the tribunal expressly rejected and excluded, and not one penny was given by the award for or on account of any of these claims. Later, and before the award was made, the tribunal announced to the commissioners of the two governments that they had also excluded and rejected the second class of claims, namely, "the national expenditure in the pursuit of these cruisers." That left for them to award only money for the destruction of property owned by the United States or owned by individuals, according to the rules of law.

We laid before the tribunal the claims made by the uninsured owners of property destroyed by the three cruisers and claims by insurers who had paid the insured owners for property destroyed by the three cruisers. What did the counsel of the British government say then before the decision? What did they say to the tribunal in reference to the claims that we are asked now to refuse to pay to the insurers? I will read a single sentence on page 385, volume 2, from the argument of the counsel for Great Britain:

The American insurance companies, who have paid the owners as for a total loss, are, in our opinion, entitled to be subrogated to the rights of the latter, according to the well-known principle that an underwriter who has paid as for a total loss acquires the rights of the assured in respect of the subject-matter of insurance. This principle was explained and acted on in the well-known English cases of Randall vs. Cochran, 1 Ves. Sen., 98, and the Quebec Fire Insurance Company vs. Saint Louis, 7 Moore, P. C., 286, and is well recognized by the courts of America.

Now, Mr. President, we have come down precisely to this state of facts: These claims were made on behalf of the uninsured owners and the insurers during the war by our representative, Mr. Adams, laying them before the proper British officers, saying "the United States will feel bound to claim and insist that you shall pay the damages these parties have sustained. We hand you now in the day of it a statement of the claim of the uninsured owner or insurer, and shall insist that the claim be paid. Then, by treaty, the two governments established later a tribunal to decide all claims made. The United States Government presented claims on behalf of the United States and on behalf of private parties. We went before that tribunal, having called on our citizens to furnish at their own expense the evidence of their claims to be laid before the tribunal. The tribunal reject every claim except the claims for direct injuries, and make no award for any other claims. The British counsel concede what I have argued to-day from our own law-books—that the insurer stood precisely in the shoes of the owner whose property had been destroyed and which he paid for. The tribunal made an award of a gross sum, not for the reason sometimes claimed, but for the reason on which this was asked by the counsel for the United States, and because we had furnished evidence that was satisfactory as to details and amounts. These private claimants had suffered by delay, and it was properly urged they ought not to be put to the expense of establishing their claims before another tribunal or be further delayed in receiving payment of their claims. The tribunal finally decided to reject the claims of the United States for expenditures incurred in pursuit of the cruisers. I will not stop to read the decision. They decided to make an award of a gross sum, as will be seen in the fourth volume, page 44. They directed Mr. Staempfli, one of their number, to prepare synoptical tables of claims, with a view of arriving at the amount to be awarded in gross. A synoptical table of the amounts was presented to the board. The following is a copy of this table, found in volume 4, page 44, of the papers and proceedings:

Estimate of Mr. Staempfli for the determination of a sum in gross.

	After the last American table.	British allowance.	Mean.
Amount of claims	$14,437,000	$7,074,000	$10,905,000
Expenditure in pursuit	6,735,000	940,000	Struck out.
Prospective profit and interruption of voyage. }	4,009,100	Struck out as such but for wages	588,000
		25 per cent. on the value of vessels	400,000
Round sum			12,000,000

This table appears in the proceedings of the tribunal of the 2d of September, 1872. In the proceedings of the same day, on page 46 of volume 4, is another table footing at $10,121,044. In these two tables no interest was included. The tribunal decided to allow interest on the claims. Adding interest and the amount, taking either of these tables, would be about fifteen and a half millions, and they agreed upon an award for that sum on the 2d of September, the day on which these tables were before them and entered in their proceedings.

Now, I submit that it is demonstrable from the proceedings that the claims for which the award was made, and without which we should have had but a trifling amount awarded, were, first, the value of the property destroyed, which was uninsured, and second, the amount which was claimed by insurance companies which had paid the insured owners of property destroyed as for a total loss.

The tribunal rejected the claims for war premiums; and yet we are asked to refuse to pay the claimants whose claims were allowed and paid and give the money to the war premium claimants whose claims were rejected. In my judgment we cannot in accordance with law or equity do this. I cannot give a vote to take the money from those (whether they are rich or poor) on account of whose property destroyed this money was awarded and paid by England to the United States Government, and give it to parties whose claims on the British government were rejected as invalid by our own tribunal. When we depart from the rules of law applicable to the case and the subject-matter, and attempt to distribute this money according to our notions of the needs of claimants or the hardships of particular cases, we abandon the only just and safe guide we have for the proper distribution of this money. My judgment is that the logic of this case is precisely this: either this money should be kept in the Treasury for the common benefit of the people of the United States, or it should be paid to the owners of property uninsured which was destroyed, and to the insurers of property destroyed by the three cruisers who paid the owners of such property as for a total loss. These insurers are by law entitled to payment as clearly as were the uninsured owners who have been paid. Then if there is any of the fund left it can be distributed to the sufferers by the other cruisers than the three or such others who suffered indirect damage, as Congress shall direct. But to decide that we will not pay the parties who have a legal right to the fund for the destruction of whose property it was received, that we will not pay these insurance companies the money that we received on their claims, is in my judgment a violation of the legal and moral duty of this Government. We will occupy an awkward position if we decide that we will not pay this money to parties whose claims were allowed by the tribunal, and we will give it to parties whose claims were rejected as invalid. The Government of the United States ought not to occupy such a position before the world.

I admit these claimants cannot compel the Government to pay over to them; but is there not a duty on the Government—a duty in morals as well as a duty resting on it by the rules of law—to distribute this fund to the parties entitled to it by law? Mr. Cushing, whose opinion is better than mine—Mr. Cushing, one of the counsel for the United States at Geneva, wrote a letter in October, the award having been made in September, 1872, a copy of which I have in my hand, and what were his views in reference to the duty of our Government and to whom this money should go? He had aided in the argument of the case; he knew all about our side of it, for he was one of the leading counsel. I will only read a portion of his letter:

In the case of the "Alabama claims," however, the United States will have in their hands a definite sum of money awarded against England by the tribunal of arbitration, and paid over by England to the United States for distribution among the parties interested, according to the award of the tribunal.

2. In the matter of the "Alabama claims" the agent and counsel of the United States presented to the tribunal detailed schedules and estimates of the claims of American citizens on account of captures by confederate cruisers fitted out in or dispatched from ports of Great Britain in violation of public law, setting forth the names of vessels captured and the names of parties interested, whether owners of ship, freight, or cargo, or officers and seamen, or insurers, and asserting the responsibility of Great Britain in the premises.

He then says:

The tribunal, in the first place, adjudged Great Britain to be guilty in respect to all captures made by the Alabama and the Florida and their tenders, and by the Shenandoah after her departure from Melbourne.

The tribunal, in the second place, examined and scrutinized the schedules and estimates of individual losses presented by the United States, and on the inspection thereof awarded a sum in gross which they conceived to be sufficient (and which I think is sufficient) to afford a just indemnity to the injured citizens of the United States.

This gross sum will, within the year, be paid by Great Britain to the United States, with interest on any delay. It will be received and held by the United States as a trust fund, to be distributed among the parties interested, conformably to the tenor and spirit of the award of the tribunal; and the Government will be bound to make such distribution promptly and justly, by the moral force of its duty of good faith to England, and its obligations to fulfill the stipulations of the treaty of Washington.

There is no contingency, uncertainty, or doubt in all this. You and the other parties in interest may, I do not hesitate to say, rest assured of the honor and good faith of the Government of the United States in this respect, with just as much of certitude as in the payment of the gold bonds of the Government.

This is the language of the counsel acting for the Government, writing to an interested party right after the award, saying to him, "we presented a list of all private claims, the uninsured whose property was destroyed, the insurers who paid for property destroyed, and others; the tribunal scrutinized the tables of these losses, and awarded a sum sufficient to pay the claims held valid, and you need not be afraid; the honor of the Government is a guarantee that a distribution in accordance with the award will be made, and not to parties whose claims against Great Britain were held by the tribunal to be unfounded and rejected."

Reference has been made to the case of Rustomjee vs. The Queen, which it is claimed is an authority in favor of the proposition that the United States Government may rightfully distribute this money received from Great Britain to whom it pleases. I will not trouble the Senate by a detailed statement of the case. It was decided in 1876, and is reported in 1st Law Reports Q. Bench, 1875, 1876. It appeared that Rustomjee was a British subject. When the war broke out between China and Great Britain he was a creditor of a Chinese guild or corporation for a considerable sum. By the war all means of collecting his debt was destroyed. In and by the treaty of peace Great Britain exacted and China paid to the government of Great Britain a sum of money to satisfy the debts of Rustomjee and other British subjects. Rustomjee had not been able to get his pay; and he instituted the action by a petition of right against the Queen to enforce payment by the judgment of the court. The court held that the action or proceeding was not maintainable against the Queen. Cockburn, C. J., states these facts in his opinion: "A debt was incurred by one of the members of that guild to the present suppliant, and his ordinary remedy to get this paid would have been by the proceedings established by the existing law of China against the cohong. War broke out between this country and China; the cohong was abolished; and the remedy which the British subjects, the present suppliant among them, would have had under the former state of things was swept away."

In the treaty of peace it was stipulated that there should be paid to Her Majesty's government a certain amount to make good these claims. This amount had been paid by China. Rustomjee had applied for payment and did not get it. He then brought what they call a petition, something in the nature of a writ of right, to compel payment by a judgment of the court. The court decided that the proceeding to enforce payment by a judgment against the Queen could not be sustained; that she was not a trustee in the sense that a suit would lie against her; she was not an agent in that sense. But the court does not decide or intimate that it would be right or just for Her Majesty's government not to pay the money over to the parties on account of whom it was paid by China. The members of the court, while holding there was no remedy in the courts against the Queen or the British government to enforce payment, say it was the duty of the government to pay the money to the parties for and on account of whom it was received from China. Chief-Justice Cockburn says:

It comes simply to this, that Her Majesty, in order to enable her to see that justice is not done to her subjects, stipulates for the payment into her hands of a sum of money. The distribution of that must be left to Her Majesty's discretion. No petition of right has ever been held to be applicable to such a case. To my mind it is utterly inconsistent with all the constitutional theories of the prerogative of the Crown to suppose that Her Majesty can be coerced by a petition of right into doing that justice which, I am quite sure, it will require no petition of right to obtain, if the facts and the merits of the case were such as to induce the government to believe that the claim was a just one. At all events, I think the petition of right will not lie, and that that is perfectly clear upon all the principles which have ever been applied to petitions of right, and all the precedents which have hitherto existed in courts of law.

Justice Blackburn says a little more pointedly:

I think there is a moral claim that it be given to the right person, which must be investigated in the manner in which Her Majesty is pleased to direct, and the ministers who direct it would probably be responsible in Parliament if they did it unjustly.

How "unjustly?" If they do not pay the money to the party on account of whose demand it was exacted and received from China. The other, Justice Lush, says:

No doubt a duty arose as soon as the money was received to distribute that money among the persons toward whose losses it was paid by the Emperor of China; but then the distribution, when made, would be, not the act of an agent, accounting to a principal, but the act of the sovereign in dispensing justice to her subjects. For any omission of that duty the sovereign cannot be held responsible. The responsibility would rest with the advisers of the Crown, and they are responsible to Parliament and to Parliament alone.

It seems to me that this case furnishes high authority that while the petition of rights would not lie, while the court could not give judgment for and enforce payment of this money which the Queen's government had received on account of these debts from China to the subject, yet that there was a moral duty resting on the government to do justice by paying the money to the party on account of whose debt or claim it had exacted it from China by negotiation and treaty. I insist that this same duty rests upon the United States Government, and that it fails in doing justice if it does not perform this duty. I have read with care the able argument of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] He concedes that as the committee put the case their bill is right; but I understand the point he makes is this, that Great Britain did not do any act; it was merely an omission to do a duty, and that for such an omission the citizens of the United States had no enforceable claim on the British government. I concede that; but I insist that when our Government does its duty to its own citizens, and, as it rightfully may, calls on the British government to pay the damages which our citizens have sustained by that omission, and the British government consents that if they were guilty of that omission of duty they would pay such damages as a tribunal should find against them, and the tribunal having found that they were guilty of that omission and that by the law of nations they were liable to pay for property of our citizens destroyed by the cruisers, and the amount of such damages is paid to the United States Government, this Government cannot rightfully refuse to pay the money received to the parties for and on account of whose just and legal claim it was paid by the British government and received by ours. Conceding the argument of my friend, the United States cannot now with justice or honor say to these claimants, for and to satisfy whose demands the money was awarded and paid: "Great Britain was not liable to you; true, we have got the money from her for the damages sustained by the destruction through her fault of your property, but we will not pay it to you." The other part of the proposition was that Great Britain was not liable for the destruction of the property of our citizens, because that was an act of war by the Confederate States; and neither the United States nor its citizens could recover damages for an act of war.

Mr. HOAR. Would it be unpleasant for the Senator from New York to allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly not. I am speaking about what the Senator said, and I will hear him with the greatest pleasure, because I may be wrong in stating his position.

Mr. HOAR. My point, which the Senator states, was this precisely, not that from a foreign omission of a public duty of government no liability arose, but that from a foreign omission of a public duty of government no liability arose to a citizen of another State wronged; that in the language of Mr. Adams in delivering his decision the only omission was of the diligence due, and that diligence was solely due to the sovereignty of this nation. Then I further said that this being declared a thing for which no citizen could have a claim, although his damage might measure the claim of his nation, when our nation presented it, when the counsel argued it, when the tribunal awarded it, when Great Britain resisted it, when Great Britain paid it, when we accepted it, each of those public acts was with the distinct and emphatic protest, we demand this, we award this, we pay this, we take this with the distinct declaration that no citizen has any interest in it whatever, and that we do not ask it because any citizen has any interest, but solely as a national claim and as a thing due to the nation and not to the citizen.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to suggest that I do not so understand the facts.

Mr. HOAR. That is the argument, whether the Senator agrees to it or not.

Mr. KERNAN. As I understand from the proceedings before the tribunal our counsel asked for a gross sum instead of sending it to a board of assessors, not because it was a claim of our Government, and it had a right to take the money as its own, but in their own language "the original wrongs to the sufferers by the acts of the insurgent cruisers have been increased by the delay in making reparation," and it is a great hardship, they further say, to send them before another tribunal.

There was nothing said to the tribunal or to Great Britain by the counsel of the United States to the effect that our Government claimed the amount to be awarded as its own property, and did not intend to distribute the same justly to the parties whose claims had been presented to and allowed by the tribunal. I have called attention to the claims as presented to the tribunal: first, public claims on behalf of the United States for pursuing war cruisers and for other national expenses and losses to the amount of many millions, and then claims for damages and losses, presented on behalf of private citizens, stating in detail each party's name and the details of his loss. These were certainly presented to the tribunal as private claims and not as claims owned by the United States.

Great Britain and the world understood that the money received for these private claims was to be paid by the United States to the parties owning them. Mr. Cushing and our other representatives so understood; and although these real owners have no tribunal to enforce their demands as courts enforce judgments, the honor and justice of the Government of the United States will protect them from wrong. If my friend's argument is right, then all this money should have remained in the Treasury. Why have we paid the uninsured owners? Was it a mere act of charity or was it because it was an act of justice and good faith on the part of the Government? If you have paid them as an act of justice based upon their legal right, then you should pay these insurers who paid for and became the legal owners of the claims and of every right and chance of reclamation and of indemnity, and whose claims were presented in their names to the tribunal, allowed as just and included in the amount of the award.

The only logic of the argument of my friend from Massachusetts would be to say that no one can have any of this money except as a gratuity. There would have been no award by the arbitrators that Great Britain should pay anything to this Government upon any such theory as is proposed here. They rejected every national claim. They rejected your claim for the increased expenses of the war; they rejected your claim for the expense of sending out vessels to pursue these cruisers. The tribunal decided that the direct damages done to the property of individuals should be paid by Great Britain. She had violated her duty as a neutral to the United States and her citizens, and they made an award, substantially, at all events, based upon the amount of these private claims. As my friend [Mr. BAYARD] well says to me, the terms of the treaty never recognized national reclamation.

Mr. President, I shall spend no time in answering the argument that there are people who are needy and poor, and therefore ought to have the money, and that the insurance companies should not have their own, because it is said they are rich. If there is to be a gratuity given to sufferers let it be out of the Treasury of the United States, or out of this money, if you please, after those who show a legal title to it have been paid. These stand precisely in law and in morals where the uninsured owners who have been paid stood. Let these insurance companies receive that which is their own, and then if there is a surplus we may give it, I concede, without any reproach, to whomsoever we think most deserving.

I am through, Mr. President, except to say that I hope each Senator will look at this question for himself. If he thinks, as I do, that we should distribute this money according to the rules of law applicable to property that comes thus into our hands, it will go to those whose claims were approved and allowed by the tribunal, and any surplus then, without injustice, may go to those whose claims were not allowed by the tribunal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the Senator withhold the motion a moment to allow me to submit a resolution calling for certain information?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

EAST FLORIDA CLAIMS.

Mr. CARPENTER, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to communicate to the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, any correspondence not heretofore published between the United States and Spain in relation to the fulfillment by the United States of the requirements of the ninth article of the treaty of 1819, between the United States and Spain.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Kentucky moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and fifty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 24, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. DAVID WILLS, D. D., of Washington, District of Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is the question of privilege raised by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] as to Monday's Journal.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Is it not in order first to read the Journal of yesterday?

The SPEAKER. The Journal of yesterday relates exclusively to the matter of the correctness of the Journal of Monday. The question which the Chair submitted to the House on yesterday was the question whether the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland contained a question of privilege. As many as are of opinion that the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland contains a question of privilege under that clause of the rule which relates to the integrity of the proceedings of the House will say "ay."

Mr. BLACKBURN. Has the Chair ruled upon the point of order that comes up under the first clause of the first rule defining the duties of the Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not as yet ruled on anything.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to raise that point of order. If he does not, I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains the point of order. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the Clerk to read the first clause of the first rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. The Speaker shall take the chair on every legislative day precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned at the last sitting, immediately call the members to order, and on the appearance of a quorum, cause the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting to be read, having previously examined and approved the same.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now the point of order that I make is that this is a new legislative day, as distinct from yesterday. The House did not take a recess on yesterday but adjourned. This is a new legislative day; and under the first clause of the first rule defining the duties of the Speaker it is declared that he—shall take the chair on every legislative day precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned at the last sitting—

That portion of the rule has been complied with—immediately call the members to order, and on the appearance of a quorum—and there has been no point that there is not a quorum here. That has been assumed—on the appearance of a quorum, cause the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting to be read—

It is not the Journal of the day before yesterday. It is the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, which was an independent, separate legislative day—having previously examined and approved the same.

I take it for granted that the Speaker has complied with the last portion of that clause, and that he has examined and approved the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday. And the point I make is that that clause of the rule will not be observed or obeyed unless the Speaker now causes the Clerk to read a Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that the Journal of Monday has not yet been disposed of—

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the Chair allow me to make a remark?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the Speaker and the House are now engaged in the process of executing that very order of the rule as to the Journal; and until that order is executed—which is certainly about the Journal of a previous day, and a little more previous than the Journal of yesterday—until that order is executed, no other order of any kind can be executed.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to submit a question to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. How does the House know what took place yesterday until the Journal is read? How can we assume anything as to the business of yesterday until the Journal is read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be the proper and consistent course to dispose of the Journal of the former day before the House takes up yesterday's Journal.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOTT. I find that by Rule I it is made the duty of the Speaker to approve the Journal. The question I ask is, under what rule the House is required to approve the Journal?

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of a repetition of the issue of yesterday as to the point of order whether any member of the House has a right to move to amend the Journal. The Chair has not the power to deprive the House of the right to correct its Journal; and that right has never been questioned. Uniformly after the reading of the Journal the Chair says: "If there be no objection, the Journal of yesterday stands approved."

Mr. HUTCHINS. As far as I am able to ascertain, there is no rule requiring the approval of the Journal by the House. That is merely the custom of the House. There is no rule which requires it, nor is there any rule which can be interpreted into anything of the kind.

The SPEAKER. There never was a rule that required that in terms, but it is an unbroken parliamentary practice.

Mr. HUTCHINS. But there is an express rule that the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting shall be read. If I can understand language we cannot proceed here at all under the rule and in order until yesterday's Journal has been read.

The SPEAKER. Under that view of the case, what becomes of the Journal of the former day?

Mr. HUTCHINS. It may never be approved. There is nothing in the rule which requires it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to deal in entire fairness with this case. I do not understand the Chair has yet announced his decision on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not announced any decision.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I call the attention of the Chair to the peculiar phraseology of the first clause of the first rule. It does not treat of journals as we are in the habit of employing the term here in the House; but it is expressly careful in defining the matter that shall be read immediately to this House. It is a history of the "proceedings of the last day's sitting," not of the last legislative day. In my short experience in Congress I have seen a Journal cover three or four days; that is, there was no Journal read during the three or four or five or six days that constituted one legislative day. I have seen one legislative day reach from one week well into another week; and all the calendar days combined furnished but one Journal, that is, a Journal of the one legislative day. But this rule is more particular, more careful. It admits of no misconception or misapprehension. It says the Speaker shall "immediately call the members to order, and on the appearance of a quorum cause the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting to be read." There is a reason for that particularity; there is logic in that rule. This House cannot tell what it is to do to-day unless it knows what it did yesterday. The question that the Chair is about to submit to the House for its decision comes up as unfinished business—to be disposed of to-day—from yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBESON. I would ask the gentleman whether this would not be true, even conceding his position to be correct: after the Journal of yesterday is disposed of the Journal of the day before yesterday would come up as unfinished business?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Unquestionably?

Mr. ROBESON. What difference would it make, then?

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is the only status it holds in this House; unfinished business coming over from yesterday. There is not power enough in this House, as long as these rules are in force, to excuse the Speaker from causing the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday to be read by the Clerk right now, in order that this House may know, and know officially, what it was engaged in doing yesterday. You have no guide before you, you have no record, no chart, by which to travel until that is done. You cannot tell whether this motion which the Speaker was about to submit to this House for determination was ever pending yesterday or not, until the Journal of yesterday's proceedings is read. And when that Journal of yesterday's proceedings shall be read to-day, it may appear that there are inaccuracies in it, that there are errors in it, or, perhaps, that there are omissions which need to be supplied. We cannot tell until the Journal is read. I would like for the Chair to tell me whether he knows that there has been any Journal of yesterday's proceedings prepared at all or not? If he does, there is not a member on this floor who does know or can know.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. Ask him the direct question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would like to ask the Speaker whether he has complied with the last portion of the first clause of this rule: whether he has "examined and approved" the Journal?

Mr. MCKENZIE. How do we know that there was any such question pending yesterday?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have said that no man in this House does know or can know; and the Speaker is not allowed to know that such a question was pending before the House yesterday or is pending to-day, until the Journal of yesterday's proceedings has been read. When this rule has been complied with, and the Journal of yesterday's proceedings has been read, then it may be that there will be found corrections to be made in it before we can accept it and proceed.

But let us go one step farther and see what an anomaly would be produced. Suppose that my view is not the correct one; suppose that the plain English of this rule means nothing. Suppose it shall be accepted and declared that it is impossible for the English language to be employed so as to make the rule plain enough to guide the proceedings in this House; for that must be the conclusion, if I am not correct.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. In one moment I will, with much pleasure. Suppose that I am in error, and that it is in order now to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday without this House having ever heard read the Journal of its work of yesterday, without the House knowing that it has any such Journal; suppose that the further consideration of that business of yesterday takes up all of this day as it took up all of yesterday and all of this week, as it may well do, I ask you when you will find the opportunity and where will you find the warrant of authority to have the Journal of yesterday's proceedings read at all? It is not admissible to read it on any other day than to-day, and if it is not read to-day you never can read it properly while this Congress lasts. From now until the 4th day of March next you never will have authority to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings unless you read it right now.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a practical question. I assume that the gentleman desires to extricate the House from its present dilemma at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Provided it can be done in a fair and legitimate manner.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Undoubtedly; and I assume that the House never does anything in its collective capacity but in a fair and honorable way. I want to understand what the gentleman means. Does he mean to say that the Journal of yesterday's proceedings has precedence in its presentation to the House for its approval over the Journal of the proceedings of the day before yesterday?

Mr. HAYES. That is it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I want to know whether as a practical proposition the gentleman simply desires that the Journal of yesterday's proceedings shall first be acted upon by the House before the House proceeds to act upon the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding day, about which we had such difficulty yesterday. I want to know what the gentleman desires.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is through with his question I will answer. I mean to insist that the plainest rule of this House shall not be violated. I do not mean to say that the reading of yesterday's Journal takes precedence of the reading of the Journal of the day before. I mean to say that the rule was complied with when the Journal of Monday was read yesterday morning. I mean to insist that the rule shall be complied with right now and the Journal of yesterday read. Then I grant you after that is disposed of the work that was being done and the question that was being decided or discussed relative to the disposition that should be made, after reading of the Journal of day before yesterday, comes up as unfinished business for this House to determine.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. That is precisely the question I desired to propound to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And that is precisely my answer.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I think it entirely immaterial, therefore, whether we act now upon the Journal of yesterday or the Journal of the previous day, so that the question pending when the House adjourned yesterday—the question of privilege which the Speaker had submitted to the House—shall then be determined. If that is so I am satisfied.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have but to add—

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. May I ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question—

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. A question in the shape of a proposition?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Well, I hope it is not a speech, for I have just yielded for one.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Not at all; I think the point which the gentleman from Kentucky has made is a good one. I agree with him that under Rule I we are likely to get into a very deep entanglement, because the proceedings of to-day may conclude without the approval of the Journal of Monday. The contest may continue to-morrow and the next day; a week or two weeks, or a month may roll up upon us without the approval of last Monday's Journal.

Now, I want to make just one proposition, which I think will unravel this great difficulty. The more I examine the question the more strongly I am inclined to the opinion that we cannot correct the Journal of Monday, because it is correct in reciting proceedings which actually occurred; but we can entertain a question of high privilege, the question presented by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE,] after the reading and approval of the Journal of Monday, not before. Now, I say to the House and to the Speaker, let us withdraw the point made by the gentleman from Ohio in regard to amending the Journal; let us take the Journal as it stands and approve it. Then let us entertain, as a question of high privilege, involving the integrity of the proceedings of this House, the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland, and dispose of it on its merits.

Mr. CARLISLE. Let me say to the gentleman—

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have not yielded, except for a question.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. One further point, with the gentleman's permission. I say that we can read and approve the Journal, and immediately thereafter the Speaker can submit to the House the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland as to whether this is a question of privilege under Rule IX, which, as I hope, proposes that the Journal of to-day shall recite the reversal of a procedure on Monday, had in violation of rule and against the known judgment of the House, and which does affect its dignity and the integrity of its proceedings.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But the gentleman is mistaken in his premises. Nobody has ever decided that this is a question of privilege.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I say the Speaker can put that question to the House after the Journal has been approved.

Mr. BLACKBURN. But if I may be permitted to express an opinion, (and it will be found upon inquiry to be pretty well founded,) the Speaker of this House has no idea that this is a question of privilege.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I take it that the House under Rule IX can say that it is a question of privilege, or it is not.

Mr. McLANE. The Speaker has submitted that question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania will admit that I have yielded to him liberally; I can yield no further.

Mr. BARBER. Mr. Speaker, what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is making a point of order, and the Chair is listening to his statement.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, there is just one point more to which I wish to call attention. For the conflicts or embarrassments or dilemmas into which this House has gotten itself, and from which the gentleman from New York says he doubts not I would very gladly aid in extricating the House, I am not responsible in the slightest degree.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Is there any rule of this House which requires that the Journal shall be approved at all by the House?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir. I am coming now to one point to which I wish to call the attention of the Speaker and the House. The rule declares that the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting shall be read immediately after the members are called to order, a quorum being present. It does not require that the Journal shall be approved except by the Speaker; it requires that he shall first examine and approve it; then it requires that it shall be read by the Clerk. It does not require that it shall be approved by the House; it may or may not be. That Journal of day before yesterday may stand here unapproved for the rest of this Congress for aught I can tell. The Journal of the last day's session of each Congress never is approved. It is not necessary, in fact. It is not required by the rule that the Journal of day before yesterday shall ever be approved; but it is imperatively demanded by the rule that the Journal of yesterday shall be read and read right now.

Mr. ROBESON. Still I would like to ask the gentleman a question, and I shall confine myself to the question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will yield in a moment. I will answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and say now, for one, I never will agree to stultify myself by admitting that the question pending here is a question of privilege, or entitled to any such consideration at the hands of this House. I now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. REED. I desire to say in reference to the point of order—

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman from Maine will permit me, I have yielded to a question from the gentleman from New Jersey, and then I shall have done.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. ROBESON. I was merely going to ask whether he answered my other question, which was, whether the Journal of the proceedings of day before yesterday would come up immediately as unfinished business? I appeal to him as a member of the Committee on Rules and an experienced parliamentarian to inform my ignorance whether there is anything in the rules or parliamentary practice which would prevent its coming up naturally and necessarily immediately after this question of the Journal of to-day is disposed of.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman and say it is not my province nor am I required to rule on a question which has never yet presented itself. If I were in the chair I would answer. I beg the gentleman to believe, in the point I have submitted, the only distinction I am seeking to draw, after having called attention to the imperative character of the plain language of the rule, is the distinction that the rule itself makes between the reading of a Journal and the approval of a Journal.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Let me ask you a question right there.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask whether the reading of the Journal, no objection being made to the Journal, it does not then stand approved by the House?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly it does.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. That is all.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Was the Journal of day before yesterday ever read? That is all the rule required. It was approved by the Speaker. The Journal of day before yesterday was approved.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It was objected to by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I admit all that. All the point I make, and the only point, is this: the Journal of the day before yesterday was read, and that ended the mandate of this rule. The Journal of yesterday has not been read and the rule will not be complied with until it is read. Then it is a matter outside of this rule as to whether the Journal of day before yesterday or the Journal of yesterday, either one or both, ever shall be approved.

Mr. REED. My judgment is opposed to the point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky, for the reasons which were given by the gentleman from Kentucky himself. He declares that we cannot proceed with to-day's business until we know what took place yesterday. How much more can we not proceed with to-day's business until we know what took place the day before yesterday?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Journal has been read.

Mr. REED. The point is just this: that Journal is not the Journal of the House and does not contain the proceedings of day before yesterday until it has been approved by this House and become the record of the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN rose.

Mr. REED. And furthermore, Mr. Speaker, if I can be allowed to make my point, the very principle for which the gentleman from Kentucky contends will lead to just the opposite conclusion. And for this reason it is a question of privilege under the rules (speaking not strictly according to the received definition of the word privilege) that the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding day shall be read, but it was equally the rule yesterday that the Journal of day before yesterday should be read and approved.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No.

Mr. REED. And it is only one privileged motion unfinished which takes the place of another privileged motion which has not yet been reached. That is certainly logical and sensible according to every principle of parliamentary law.

Mr. BLACKBURN. In one word—

Mr. REED. I will listen to the gentleman.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman point me to any provision of any one of the forty-five rules in this revision which requires the Journal to be approved by the House at all?

Mr. REED. I say to the gentleman that in no parliamentary body on the face of the earth has it ever been doubted that that body had a right to control and the right to approve its own Journal; and whether it be in the rules or not everybody knows that it is a principle of parliamentary law too plain to be disputed and too clear to be contradicted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say—

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. REED. I will answer the question of the gentleman.

Mr. McMILLIN. I understand the gentleman to say that we cannot proceed until we know what the Journal of the day before yesterday's proceedings contained.

Mr. REED. Not at all; I was only repeating the argument of the gentleman from Kentucky. Let him defend it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then how could we know what it was on which you were voting yesterday?

Mr. REED. I guess we could find out if we tried—most of us.

The SPEAKER. The rule on this subject has remained as a rule of this House, unchanged, since 1789.

Mr. REED. If you will permit me I will refer the gentleman from Kentucky to the second section of the twenty-fourth rule:

On all days other than Monday as soon as the Journal is read and approved.

That does not refer to the approval of the Speaker, because it is the approval which comes subsequent to the reading of the Journal, and must be by the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. What rule has the gentleman referred to.

Mr. REED. The twenty-fourth rule; the first line of the second clause of that rule and first word of second line.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope the gentleman from Maine will not take his seat yet.

Mr. REED. No; I will retain the floor.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want to talk to him a little.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No; the gentleman has yielded to me.

Mr. REED. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Kentucky has called for the reading of the rule in regard to the approval of the Journal. The gentleman from Maine has read the rule named, in which a distinct provision for the reading of the Journal is made, and I wish to read Rule No. 1, not printed in our revised rules of the other day, but a rule which the gentleman will acknowledge. It is found on page 7 of the Digest of this House, being the Constitution of the United States, section 5 of article 1.

Each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings—

Not the clerk shall keep a Journal, but each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings. Now, for our convenience we direct a clerk whom we employ and call the journal clerk to do the writing for us; but when that writing has been presented to the House, under the rule of the Constitution the House proceeds to "keep" that Journal according to its manner by approving or disapproving; and therefore under the Constitution of the United States, which is the paramount rule of this House, we are now proceeding to keep the Journal of Monday, and we have not yet kept it and it never has been kept until we decide the question raised about it on yesterday.

Mr. LAPHAM. Now will the gentleman yield to me to make a point?

Mr. REED. I will yield to the gentleman from Kentucky at his request.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED. I am afraid the gentleman from North Carolina will "mix things up." [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman from Ohio stated, as I understood him, that under the Constitution of the United States each House kept the Journal of its proceedings, and must do so.

Mr. GARFIELD. Shall keep it.

Mr. STEELE. Shall do so. Then I understand the requirement is the House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings, but not of what it did not do.

Mr. REED. That is as old as the hills.

Mr. STEELE. It is old but very true, like a great many other things.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House determines that.

Mr. STEELE. It is the point of all, and no subterfuge can get over it.

Mr. REED. The House may judge what are and what are not "proceedings"—Journal 1, 29, page 1047.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] anticipated me in reading that clause of the Constitution of the United States. I had already marked it here to present it with my compliments to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, if the gentleman from Maine, as well as the gentleman from Ohio will look at that very fifth section of the first article of the Constitution which the gentleman from Ohio has read, and will pause and scan it closely, he will find a very proper rebuke for his work of yesterday. The Constitution in that section declares that each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings. It nowhere permits, much less does it command, that it shall mutilate, falsify, or destroy its Journal.

Mr. REED. I submit to the gentleman from Kentucky that that is not on the point of order but on the merits.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Maine quoted elaborately from his store of parliamentary learning, and said he wanted to know where any authority could be found for the position I took. If the gentleman will look at a standard work known as Cushing on the Law Practice of Legislative Assemblies—

Mr. REED. It is by no means a standard work of American parliamentary law on very many points.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is a work on the law and practice of deliberative assemblies recognized the world over, and is an American book.

Mr. REED. It treats mostly of English proceedings.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is an American book and stands without parallel or peer in the estimation of parliamentarians in this country. If the gentleman pleads in bar his testimony on the character of the work, I suppose I must submit and agree that there is no authority that I or any other man can offer.

Mr. REED. I leave it to the fitting audience, though few, capable of judging of such matters, whether the gentleman from Kentucky belongs to that number or not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman means to be selfish and to exclude everybody but himself.

Mr. REED. No; I mean to include the most learned men on your side, among whom I intend to include the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I accept the gentleman's explanation. Cushing says in section 329:

If any mistake or omission occurs in the entries of the Clerk and it is taken notice of or pointed out on the same day it may be corrected either by the order of the House or by the Clerk himself without any order—

The Clerk is in absolute possession and control of the Journal—but if the mistake or omission is not discovered until afterward it ought not to be corrected without the order of the House, upon the report of a committee appointed to investigate the subject.

I quote further from section 418:

The Journal is to be kept or made up in the first instance by the Clerk alone who is the sworn recording officer of the assembly subject only to the control of the assembly itself and not to the control of the presiding officer—

Mr. REED. That is so.

Mr. BLACKBURN.

Or of any other member; though in cases of difficulty and importance the form of the entry has been settled—

By what? The motion of a member and the vote of the House? No, sir—

Though in cases of difficulty and importance the form of entry has been settled by a committee appointed for the purpose.

And in no other way.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman from Kentucky say the Journal of the proceedings of the House is its Journal without the approval of the House?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I say that so far as parliamentary law or the rule of the House goes, that approval is not needed. And I cite in support of that assertion a fact which is stronger than any argument that the gentleman from Maine, or I, or any other man may offer, that there never was a legislative assembly on this continent, and never will be one until the end of time, where that rule, if rule there be, is not violated. On the 4th day of next March this House will have a Journal made up. That Journal will never be approved while time and eternity run their course. The last day of every Congress goes, with the Journal of its proceedings, unread and unapproved; yet it is as binding a Journal as that of any other day's session. It goes unapproved because there is no subsequent day's sitting at which it can be either read or approved.

But we have drifted away from the point. The point I submit is that under the first clause of Rule I, the Speaker after calling the members to order shall, on the appearance of a quorum, cause the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting to be read, having previously examined and approved the same.

Mr. REED. I submit to the gentleman from Kentucky that he is using up all of my time.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield the floor back to the gentleman; and if I am fortunate enough to get the floor again I shall be happy to return the compliment by yielding to the gentleman from Maine a portion of my time if he desires it.

Mr. LAPHAM. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me for a question?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAPHAM. The question I desire to ask is this: Why is it that the rule requires the Journal to be read to the House?

Mr. REED. In order that the House may approve of it, as provided in Rule XXIV, or disapprove of it, as it pleases. There would be no sense in reading the Journal to the House unless the House is to do something about it. And I say the universal practice of this House from the very first has been that the Journal shall be read and approved by the House. Day in and day out gentlemen rise and ask to have the Journal corrected before being approved.

To doubt or forget this is the most singular case of absence of memory or inattentiveness that has ever fallen under my observation.

Mr. GARFIELD. Read this rule of the Senate.

Mr. REED. And I beg leave to read from the rules of the Senate, as throwing light upon this subject. I read the last clause of the first rule:

And when any motion shall be made to amend or correct the same (the Journal) it shall be deemed a privileged question and proceeded with until disposed of by the Senate.

I present that merely as showing the opinion of the parliamentarians who prepared that rule, and the custom of legislative bodies in this country.

I do not find it necessary to reply to anything that has been said with regard to Cushing. I believe the quotations will be found to sustain my views entirely and completely.

Mr. WARNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REED. I shall be happy to answer a question for the gentleman.

Mr. WARNER. As I understand the gentleman from Maine, he takes the ground that the Journal of Monday must be approved before the Journal of yesterday can be read.

Mr. REED. Precisely.

Mr. WARNER. Granting that the House has control of the Journal and may correct it, it has the entire control of the Journal of its proceedings?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. WARNER. Does it follow that the Journal of Monday's proceedings must be approved by the House when the question is raised before the Journal of yesterday's proceedings can be read?

Mr. REED. Yes; by reason of the first clause of Rule I, which has been read by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] and for the reasons insisted upon by him.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I desire to call the attention of the House and of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to a practical decision which was made by him as Speaker pro tempore in this House last Saturday. I read from the RECORD of Saturday's proceedings.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Then the RECORD proceeds to state that the Speaker pro tempore caused to be read a letter from Mr. Speaker RANDALL. Then there is this:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Journal will not be read this morning. * * * The Journal will be read on Monday next.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Why?

Mr. NEWBERRY. No matter why. The rules had not been suspended, unless the Speaker pro tempore suspended them himself on his own motion.

The SPEAKER. The character of business for Saturday was determined by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Out of kindness to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] I want to save him from a mistake that may be awkward for him. On Saturday last, by unanimous consent, the Journal was not read, as on every day when no legislative proceedings are to be had.

Mr. NEWBERRY. How did the House know on Saturday that any such proceedings had taken place on Friday without the Journal was read? I want a practical answer to that question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Was the gentleman in the House on Saturday?

Mr. NEWBERRY. Whether I was or not, the House was in session.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I want a direct answer, because it is a practical question.

Mr. NEWBERRY. No; I was not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman had been in his seat he would have heard the occupant of the chair announce that by unanimous consent the Journal of yesterday's proceedings would not be read, the House having met for debate only.

Mr. NEWBERRY. That is not the record. The RECORD says:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Journal will not be read this morning, the session of to-day having been assigned for debate only.

It does not say that by unanimous consent it was not read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. One word.

Mr. NEWBERRY. All right.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman will look a little further into the RECORD he will find that he is still in error and has made another blunder. On Wednesday the House ordered, and the order was entered on the Journal which was read Thursday, that there should be no business transacted during the session of Saturday.

Mr. NEWBERRY. The reading of the Journal is not business; it is merely a record of the proceedings of the House from day to day; and the Speaker pro tempore cannot avoid the practical results of his decision in that way.

Mr. BLACKBURN. "The Speaker pro tempore" does not seek to avoid it at all, but he calls the attention of the House to the fact that an order was entered on Wednesday, and on Thursday the Journal was read giving the House that information. "The Speaker pro tempore," while seeking to avoid no responsibility for any of his decisions, simply expresses his regret at being unable to enable the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] to see so plain a point.

Mr. GARFIELD. How could we know on Saturday morning that the agreement of a former day to have nothing but debate on Saturday had not been rescinded on Friday? Nothing but the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday could have made it officially known that the former order was not rescinded. According to the argument of my friend from Kentucky the full reading of the Journal of the preceding day was necessary to make it sure that the order of the House was still in force, that there should be nothing but debate on Saturday.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman, and say that I never knew before—

Mr. GARFIELD. That is your argument.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No; it is my argument which you are trying to pervert as you tried yesterday to pervert the Journal of the proceedings of the day before.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; let me state. The gentleman has made an argument that we cannot proceed at all until we know officially from hearing the Journal read what may have been the order of the day before.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I say—

Mr. GARFIELD. And I say how could he or the House on Saturday last have known but that all their orders about adjournment over and about a session for debate only might have been rescinded, and that it was the duty of the House to go on with the consideration of the appropriation bill or something else on Saturday last, if his argument is good, unless he had caused to be read the Journal of the proceedings of the day before?

Mr. BLACKBURN. As to the questions propounded or the criticisms that the two gentlemen have sought to pass I do not think they stand in need of any answer, certainly that of the gentleman from Ohio does not, for the answer is too plain. In the first place the rule under which we are now considering this point of order declares that these proceedings are to be had upon each legislative day, each day when legislative business is to be transacted. That was not the case last Saturday.

A MEMBER. How did you know that?

Mr. BLACKBURN. That question has been asked twice; I will try to answer it once. We knew it because an order had been entered on Wednesday and was read to the House on Thursday morning as a part of the Journal. Even if it had been rescinded it would not and could not have mattered on Saturday, because there was no business to be done on Saturday; it was so stated from the Chair, and was so accepted by the House by unanimous consent.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] suggests that probably "the gentleman from Kentucky" who happened to be occupying the chair did not then anticipate this debate. I reply that the occupant of the chair needed not to have anticipated this debate; but I did not anticipate the strait to which the other side of the House would find itself reduced this morning in trying to violate the first clause of our first rule, now only three weeks old—ignoring its plainest provisions and undertaking to put it beyond the power of the Speaker or of the House itself to have the Journal of yesterday's proceedings read at all.

Mr. NEWBERRY. If that is the rule, why was it not enforced in this House on Saturday?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It was fully complied with.

Mr. NEWBERRY. If the gentleman did not direct the reading of the Journal of the preceding day he did not comply with the rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not responsible for the incapacity of the gentleman to understand either the rule or my remarks. I say that Rule I was complied with on Saturday. The two months' debate that we had upon the rules ought certainly to have sufficed to have taught everybody in the House by the mere process of absorption something about the rules.

Mr. NEWBERRY. If the gentleman from Kentucky is satisfied with the position into which these rules have brought the House, so that it is absolutely in a dead-lock and can do nothing under the rules, I give him full credit.

Mr. ATKINS. I would like to know who has the floor?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that by the Constitution of the United States this House is required to keep a Journal of its proceedings. In accordance with the rule adopted in 1789, (the practice under which has been unbroken,) the House each morning approves the Journal of the proceedings of the prior day's session. The Chair puts the question in this form: "If there be no objection, the Journal of the prior day's proceedings will stand approved." That has been the practice under the old rule; and the new rule is in language on this point the same as the rule adopted in 1789.

The first clause of Rule XXIV, which has been alluded to by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. REED,] regulates the business of Monday, and states distinctly that the Journal shall be approved. The Chair thinks it is in accord with the uniform practice in all legislative bodies that the Journal shall be approved. It is also the rule of the Senate—

Mr. CONGER. The second clause of Rule XXIV says, "On all other days than Monday, as soon as the Journal is read and approved."

The SPEAKER. The approval of the Journal on other days, as well as on Mondays, is not provided for by mere implication, but by the direct terms of the rule.

Mr. CONGER. The two clauses taken together provide for the approval of the Journal on every day of the week.

The SPEAKER. That is the view of the Chair. He therefore thinks it is not only in accordance with the practice, but is obligatory upon the House each legislative day to take action on its Journal. In submitting this morning the questions of privilege, first as to Monday's Journal, which came before the House for its determination on the point whether it involved a question of privilege or not, the Chair based his action upon Rule IX, which states that "questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings," and provides in the last clause that such questions "shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess."

Here is a question submitted to the House for its determination as a question of privilege, relating to the Journal of Monday—a Journal prior to that which would be read under the construction which the gentleman from Kentucky puts upon Rule I. But it matters not whether the Journal of yesterday's proceedings be read now or not, for the reason that if read the question of privilege as to a prior day's Journal would immediately come up, and the House must dispose of the Journal of its proceedings in the order of date. The Chair therefore thinks that it is really not a matter of consequence whether the Journal of yesterday's proceedings be read now or not. If read, the question will immediately come up on the prior day's Journal.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Do I understand the Chair to rule that the Journal of yesterday's proceedings shall or shall not be read?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is entirely willing to leave that to the House. The Chair has expressed his reason for the opinion that the question as to the prior day's Journal must first be disposed of.

Mr. REAGAN. Let us see whether we cannot reach a disposition of this whole subject.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Not until the Journal is read or until the Chair refuses to allow it to be read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not refuse anything of the kind.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to submit a proposition. When the question of order was made by the gentleman from Michigan it was announced by the Speaker that the Journal did state what had taken place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to hear the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. When the Journal was read on yesterday a question was made on the correctness of the Journal by the gentleman from Michigan. The Speaker announced the Journal did recite what had occurred. The object of making the question was to secure a different reference of the bill from that which appeared to have been made on the Journal. Now, then, the whole trouble came from the effort on the question of order for the correction of the Journal and changing the reference of a bill. I submit there is an easy way, a parliamentary way, out of the trouble, and I simply desire to state what I think it is, to see whether the House will not accept it. We have now come back by our proceedings to the motion submitted by the gentleman from Ohio to correct the Journal.

Mr. GARFIELD. No, sir; the motion of the gentleman from Maryland is the one before the House. It supervened above mine.

Mr. REAGAN. That question and the question submitted by the gentleman from Maryland. If the gentleman from Maryland will withdraw his question of privilege, and the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his motion and let it stand there, then a resolution can be introduced, when in order, to secure a different reference of this bill and place the subject under the control of the House in a parliamentary way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is uncertain when such resolution would be in order under the construction of the gentleman. It might be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I am submitting a way by which we can get out of this difficulty.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better accompany it with a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. If it can be done only by consent, we have this way: we can vote down the privileged question and the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, if he does not see proper to withdraw it, and let some gentleman interested in the matter introduce a resolution and let us control it in a parliamentary way.

Mr. CONGER. After the decision of the Chair on this question, and after having submitted to the House whether the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland is a privileged question, and the vote having been ordered on it, I think Rule IX clearly requires that the House shall first decide whether this be a question of privilege before any other question is taken. If the House does decide it is a question of privilege, then, under Rule IX, no other proceeding can be had.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I ask the gentleman to speak louder. I cannot hear a word he says.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is on the floor.

Mr. SPRINGER. What is now before the House? Has the Chair disposed of the point of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit that question to the House, whether the Journal of yesterday's proceedings shall first be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire that question settled now because the gentleman from Michigan is proceeding to discuss the merits.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman from Illinois could only keep his seat for a moment it would gratify me, and I believe all the rest of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I should be most happy to gratify the gentleman from Michigan, for one who stands on his feet all the time should take his seat. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Yes; that is more agreeable to the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. It is more agreeable to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I admit it is hard on the gentleman from Illinois. I should be preferred to him at any time. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I am sorry I cannot hear the gentleman; I should like to hear what he said.

Mr. CONGER. Now, if I may be allowed to proceed—

Mr. SPRINGER. What is it?

Mr. CONGER. I said it was an awful reflection on the gentleman from Illinois that the House should prefer me to him. [Laughter.] Mr. SPRINGER. That is the severest remark the gentleman could have made—that it was a serious reflection upon the House he should be preferred to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, might I proceed? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. CONGER. If the proposition of the Chair in submitting this question of privilege to the House be proper—and no one disputes it—and the House having already ordered the yeas and nays to be voted on that question, which has been submitted and is now pending, I claim that under Rule IX while that proposition is before the House in that shape no motion or proceeding is in order except a motion to fix a day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn or—

Mr. HUTCHINS. Mr. Speaker, I call the gentleman from Michigan to order.

Mr. CONGER. I say that no motion or proceeding is in order—

Mr. HUTCHINS. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. Now we will hear my friend, Mr. HUTCHINS.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I call the gentleman to order for the reason that he speaks now of a proceeding of this House which he assumes occurred on yesterday. Now, I do not know that any such proceeding ever took place, nor do any of the members of this House who might have happened to be absent on yesterday. No Journal has been read for the information of the members.

Mr. CONGER. The previous question was called on yesterday, and the yeas and nays were ordered on the question of privilege.

Mr. HUTCHINS. We have no means of knowing that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Michigan has the right to state his case in his own way.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I have no doubt of that; but I simply state that the gentleman is alleging as a fact a matter which took place here yesterday and in reference to which we have no record.

Mr. CONGER. I simply answer that by quoting the language of the gentleman from Kentucky: That every gentleman of ordinary sense in this House is expected to remember what did occur here on yesterday. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUTCHINS. The gentleman from Michigan appears to have the best memory of any man on earth, for he remembers what did not occur on Monday. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. Now I have got past that corner. [Laughter.]

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that having entertained the question of privilege, and the same having been submitted to the House, and the House having so far entertained it as to order the vote by yeas and nays on it, that Rule IX, in my judgment, applies here, and provides that no other motion is in order except the propositions contained in that rule, which are to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, or to provide for a recess. If that be under the ruling of the Chair a proper decision, I object to any other proceeding than the submission of this privileged question to the House, and object to any other motion or proceeding than those specifically mentioned in this rule.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that there is a plain and satisfactory way provided here under the rules for the settlement of this question.

Rule I provides that—

The Speaker shall take the chair on every legislative day precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned at the last sitting, immediately call the members to order, and on the appearance of a quorum, cause the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting to be read.

Now, sir, there is no mistaking that; it is plain and explicit. Further than this we find that Rule XXIV requires the approval of the Journal; but it does not follow (and that is the point I make here) that the Journal should be approved on the day it is read. But in regard to reading the Journal the rule is imperative, and I do not think it is a question that the Speaker should submit to the House, but is a question purely addressed to the Chair. The Journal being read. Then the question raised on the Journal of the preceding day arises, and I take it for granted that that question must be settled prior to any approval of the Journal of to-day. When the Journal of to-day is read the question necessarily arises as to the order of business, and that order, it seems to me, would be first a determination of the question raised on the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. BLOUNT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know what question is before the House, whether it be the point of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky or the question of privilege of the gentleman from Maryland.

The SPEAKER. The point of order made by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I was going to ask whether my point of order was not the pending question. Now, I have but this word to say: I am not raising the question as to where precedence will be given when this Journal has been read. That is a question that comes up after the Journal of yesterday shall have been read and approved, and it will then be time enough, and not until then, to determine whether motions to correct the Journal of the day before or motions to correct the Journal of yesterday shall take precedence one of another. My point is this: the Journal of yesterday's proceedings must be read, and read now.

Mr. REED. Read for what? For action or not?

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman cannot switch me off again. I am insisting upon a ruling on this point of order, and it is simply a point of order and one on which the Chair is called to rule.

I only desire the House to know that I sever these two questions. I am not insisting by my point of order that when the Journal of yesterday is read a motion to amend it will take precedence of a motion to amend the Journal of the day before. I am simply insisting that the Journal of yesterday be read now.

Mr. REED. Does not the gentleman intend to take that ground?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then the question will come up whether a motion to amend the Journal of the day before yesterday or a motion to amend the Journal of yesterday takes precedence.

Mr. SPARKS. I am on the same line as the gentleman from Kentucky; and I desire to ask him whether or not he concedes the point that when the Journal of yesterday is read, which we are now insisting upon shall first be done, the question will then first recur on the approval of the Journal of the day before yesterday?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will not concede that.

Mr. SPARKS. I am willing to concede that.

The SPEAKER. It is an accepted parliamentary rule, governing all legislative bodies, and is a practice of the House, that the House shall regulate the manner of its proceedings. The Chair therefore submits the question whether the Journal of yesterday shall first be read. As many as are in favor of the proposition that the Journal of yesterday shall now be read will say "ay."

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Illinois cannot rise to a question of order when the House is dividing on a question of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. But I rise to a point of order on that very question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear.

Mr. SPRINGER. The fourth clause of Rule I provides that the Speaker—

Shall sign all acts, addresses, joint resolutions, writs, warrants, and subpoenas of, or issued by order of the House, and decide all questions of order, subject to an appeal by any member.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman would not want the Chair to decide a question about which he had a doubt and about which he wanted an expression of the House. He would surely not prevent the Chair from such submission of the question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire the Chair to decide the point of order under the rule, subject to the right of any member to appeal from his decision. The Chair may submit whether a particular question is a question of privilege or not, but the Chair cannot submit a point of order for the decision of the House. The Chair must himself decide it first.

The SPEAKER. The Chair states distinctly he is in doubt on this point and chooses to submit the question. He is here by the will of the House and submits this question to the decision of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. The House can only decide upon an appeal from the Speaker's decision. I insist that the Speaker must first decide this question.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. If the House votes that the Journal of yesterday shall not be read, will it then be in order to bring before the House anything that is a part of the proceedings of yesterday?

The SPEAKER. If the House votes that the Journal of yesterday be not read, the next question will be the question of privilege presented by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE.]

Mr. BLAND. But after the House has refused to order the record of yesterday's proceedings to be read how can we know what is upon that record, the House having voted that it shall not be read?

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to determine. The question submitted to the House is whether the Journal of yesterday's proceedings shall be now read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. There has been objection to submitting that question to the House without a decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks the instruction of the House, and there is nothing in the rules to prevent him from doing so.

Mr. CHALMERS. I do not know that I understand the proposition correctly. I have prepared a statement of what I understand to be the question and desire to have it read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever on the reading of the Journal it appears that any bill has been referred to a committee when in the opinion of any member it would have been referred to another committee if the attention of the House had been directed to such reference by the title of the bill, then it shall be a question of privilege to move that such reference may be changed before the Journal is approved.

Mr. CHALMERS. Is that the effect of the motion?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot rule upon a paper in that form. As many as are in favor of the Journal of yesterday being now read will say "ay."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before the roll-call proceeds I make the point of order that it requires a vote of two-thirds to suspend the rule requiring the Journal to be read.

The SPEAKER. That point does not arise until after the vote shall have been taken.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I make the point of order that a motion to suspend the rules cannot be entertained except on the first and third Mondays of each month and during the last six days of the session.

The SPEAKER. There is no motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. SPRINGER. It requires a motion to suspend the rules to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will proceed with the roll-call.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 115, nays 127, not voting 50; as follows:

YEAS—115.

So the House refused to require the reading at this time of the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. MITCHELL until the 25th instant, unless both parties return before that time.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. SAPP until the 10th of April on all yea-and-nay votes of a political character on which the democratic and republican parties shall be opposed, provided the pair shall not operate to prevent a quorum of the House.

Mr. KEIFER with Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, until Friday of next week, on all political questions.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, with Mr. MILES on political questions.

Mr. PRESOTT with Mr. RICHMOND.

Mr. SHERWIN with Mr. WRIGHT.

Mr. BELFORD with Mr. LE FEVRE.

Mr. FORT with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. MORTON with Mr. COX.

Mr. DICK with Mr. BLISS.

Mr. MARTIN, of North Carolina, with Mr. SCALES.

Mr. ACKLEN with Mr. FELTON.

Mr. HAMMOND, of New York, with Mr. STEPHENS.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, with Mr. WILBER on all political and tariff questions on yea-and-nay votes, not to affect a quorum.

Mr. ORTH with Mr. JOHNSTON.

Mr. SPEER, for to-day, with Mr. NEWBERRY.

Mr. LORING with Mr. BRAGG.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia, (who is at his room sick,) with Mr. HAWK.

Mr. ATHERTON with Mr. ANDERSON.

Mr. EVINS with Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I am announced as paired with Mr. MILES on all political questions. Not regarding this as a political question, I have voted.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOTT. My point of order is that the reading of the Journal is peremptorily demanded by the rules, which cannot be set aside except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated that by universal practice all parliamentary bodies have the power to regulate the manner of their proceeding. The House has just expressed its opinion in relation to the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, and the Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] in obedience to the views of the House just expressed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I think the same question was raised some time ago by some gentleman who desired to have the reading of the Journal dispensed with, and I understood the Chair then to decide that it was not in order to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always held that under the rules the Journal must be read and approved. Sometimes in the experience of the Chair it has been waived; but that has always been when there was no conflict.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does the Chair say that it is competent for the House to dispense with the reading of the Journal without unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It has been occasionally done by unanimous consent; but in this case there is a controversy.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The point made by the gentleman from Kentucky is that unanimous consent is necessary.

The SPEAKER. This is not a proposition to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

Mr. McLANE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the question raised by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] as a question of privilege.

Mr. McLANE. I ask that the resolution may be read.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should sustain the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, by which this is declared to be a question of privilege—

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland will not be voted on first.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I know that; but in order for us to vote intelligently, I want to know what will be the effect of that motion if carried.

The SPEAKER. If the House should decide it to be a question of privilege, it will come up in the manner presented by the gentleman from Maryland, and then the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to move to lay it on the table, in accordance with his purpose indicated yesterday.

Mr. MILLS. If that proposition is now pending, I make my motion.

The SPEAKER. That is not the question now pending.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. If the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland be sustained, would it be competent to move to refer the measure in controversy?

The SPEAKER. A motion to commit would be in order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. To commit to what committee?

The SPEAKER. To a standing or to a select committee. The Chair thinks that for an intelligent understanding of the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland it had better be read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask from what will it be read?

The SPEAKER. From the paper the gentleman sends up to be read. Mr. BLACKBURN. It is not to be read from the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is not necessary. The gentleman would have the right to modify it at any rate.

Mr. McLANE. I have just sent my proposition to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read whatever the gentleman from Maryland presents. The Chair is not advised as to the nature of the proposition.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I reserve any point of order upon it.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know by what authority this resolution is to be read.

The SPEAKER. By the authority of a majority of the House that declared a moment ago that they would consider this subject.

Mr. BLAND. The Journal of yesterday has not been read, and we do not know that this resolution was before the House yesterday. There is no authority to read the resolution or to act upon it.

The SPEAKER. This resolution, as the Chair is advised, is not the same as that introduced by the gentleman yesterday.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. What right has the gentleman to introduce it now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has yet to hear the resolution read.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Maryland has not at this stage the right to offer a resolution.

The SPEAKER. A question of consideration as to priority having been raised, the House has practically decided by a majority vote that it will first consider what relates to the Journal of Monday, and then proceed to the reading of the Journal of Tuesday.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That has not been voted on.

The SPEAKER. That is the practical result.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask the Speaker to state whether anything has been voted on except a proposition in the nature of instructions submitted by the Chair to the House, for the Chair's own guidance, as to whether the Journal of yesterday should be read or not.

The SPEAKER. The House has directed the Chair not to cause to be read the Journal of yesterday at this time. Immediately then, by consequence of that vote, comes up the question of privilege on the approval of Monday's Journal.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I raise a point of order and ask to be allowed to state it. If the Journal of yesterday's proceedings had been read, the rule would provide what should be the regular order. Now, according to the construction which the Chair gives to the vote of the House (in which I do not concur) the House has decided that the Journal of yesterday shall not be read.

The SPEAKER. Shall not now be read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now I call for the regular order; and under the second clause of Rule XXIV the regular order is the morning hour for the presentation of reports of committees.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I make this point of order—

Mr. CONGER. I call for the reading of the resolution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This House cannot officially know what transpired yesterday. In other words, yesterday forms a hiatus until the Journal of yesterday's proceedings has been read.

The SPEAKER. The House by a majority vote refused to allow the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. REED. There is one exception to that, and I think the gentleman from Illinois remembers it. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The point of order I make is this: that unless the Journal is read, this House cannot officially know what has transpired yesterday. Therefore no proceedings can be based on the action of yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that the House knew what it was doing when it gave its vote. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. The rule provides that the Journal of the previous day's sitting shall be read. I desire to know whether that rule can be dispensed with except in the usual way.

The SPEAKER. The House has given a construction to the rule, and one which binds the Chair; for the House has refused by a direct vote to have the Journal of yesterday read.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Can the House, except by a suspension of the rules, dispense with that rule requiring the reading of yesterday's Journal?

The SPEAKER. This House has the power, in one way or the other, either by expressing its opinion in the manner it did or through the agency of an appeal, to put its interpretation and construction upon the rules, and that interpretation and construction, when given, is binding upon the Chair.

Mr. ROBESON. Has not the Chair decided the question of order?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I demand the floor. I had the floor before the gentleman from New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York rise to a point of order?

Mr. HUTCHINS. I mean to say the only effect of the last resolution is to suspend the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Temporarily.

Mr. HUTCHINS. To suspend its reading. We passed over that. We proceeded to the regular business.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland will now be read.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a parliamentary question, whether that resolution is unfinished business coming over from yesterday or a proposition now introduced.

The SPEAKER. The question of the approval of the Journal of Monday comes over and the House has by a vote directed it to be first acted upon.

Mr. BLAND. Come over from when, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. From yesterday.

Mr. ROBESON. That is the question the House has decided.

Mr. BLAND. There is nothing to show that. The Chair does not know that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he does know it.

Mr. BLAND. Will the Speaker submit that question to the House, as he has been in the habit of submitting questions, whether that resolution did come over or not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no actual, positive knowledge, but he does decide that the question of the approval of Monday's Journal does come over to be first considered by order of the House.

Mr. BLAND. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. McLANE. I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has, but there is an appeal taken.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman cannot appeal from the decision of the House. The House has just decided that question.

The SPEAKER. Such appeal would be the House appealing from its own decision. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER. It appeals from itself to the Speaker.

Mr. BLAND. I appeal from the ruling of the Speaker in submitting that resolution as coming over from yesterday.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman cannot appeal under a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ROBESON. Let us have the regular order.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I move the House adjourn. I am going to have this House brought back to the regular order of business. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman is that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. McLANE. I did not surrender the floor except to points of order.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I demand a division on the motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 33, noes 121.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. I move, then, that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock this evening, so it may come back here in good humor and retrace its foolish steps.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 119.

So the House refused to take a recess.

Mr. MILLS. I move to lay on the table the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be whether the proposition presented is a question of privilege.

Mr. MILLS. And I move to lay that on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is submitted to the House.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland will be read, and the Chair will then submit the question of privilege.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House being of opinion that the reference of the bill No. 5265 to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was incorrect in its reference: Therefore,

Resolved, That the said committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The question is, does this present a question of privilege?

Mr. KNOTT. Is that now before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is. The question presented is whether this under Rule IX, which provides for "the integrity of the proceedings of the House," presents a question of privilege.

Mr. KNOTT. What became of the resolution offered on yesterday? I understand that when the House adjourned yesterday there was a question of privilege pending on a resolution offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the yeas and nays on the pending question.

Mr. KNOTT. I believe I have the floor. I understand that on yesterday there was a question of privilege pending on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The SPEAKER. The resolution was not before the House on yesterday because the House did not determine whether it was a question of privilege or not.

Mr. KNOTT. Will the Speaker allow me?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. KNOTT. I say on yesterday when the House adjourned the question of privilege raised by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] was pending. Now, I ask what has become of that resolution?

The SPEAKER. That resolution was read to the House for information on yesterday as stated by the gentleman.

Mr. McLANE. And now it has been modified to some extent.

The SPEAKER. The first question presented was as to whether it contained a question of privilege.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask the Speaker, does the Journal of yesterday show that that resolution was simply read for information?

The SPEAKER. It was not before the House by right.

Mr. KNOTT. Then how can the question of privilege be raised on it if it is not before the House?

The SPEAKER. That relates to the subject-matter. Whether the subject-matter of the resolution is a question of privilege or not is for the House to determine.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was not reduced to writing on yesterday or read from the desk, as I understand. It was simply suggested as a matter to be offered at some time in the controversy.

Mr. SPRINGER. The resolution was read yesterday to the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman made a motion on yesterday and at a subsequent time offered to reduce it to writing.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon; it was read.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOTT. If the resolution was pending on yesterday is it not unfinished business to-day?

The SPEAKER. The question of the approval of the Journal is in the nature of unfinished business, and the gentleman from Maryland on yesterday rose and stated the motion which he claimed was a question of privilege. That question on yesterday was undetermined by the House. It comes up now as the unfinished business.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understand that the gentleman from Maryland has withdrawn the resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is this question debatable.

Mr. McLANE. I have a right to make my explanation.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask the gentleman from Maryland to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman from Ohio has stated that the resolution which has just been read from the Clerk's desk was not read on yesterday.

Mr. GARFIELD. I did not notice that it was read on yesterday.

Mr. McLANE. It was read as a verbal notice of the question of privilege. Later on some gentleman on this or the other side of the House asked to have it read. It was read and is printed in the RECORD, and if gentlemen refer to the RECORD they will find the text of the resolution, as reduced by me to writing, printed on page 28 of this morning's RECORD. I will read:

Mr. SIMONTON. I ask for the reading—

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland has the floor.

Mr. McLANE. I decline to yield.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot do that while the gentleman from Maryland occupies the floor, unless he yields the floor or desires to call him to order.

Mr. BLAND. Then I call the gentleman to order for the purpose of making a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state wherein the gentleman from Maryland is out of order.

Mr. BLAND. He is out of order in reading from a record which the Chair has decided cannot be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman appears to be reading from what is known as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which is not subject to the approval of the House.

Mr. SIMONTON. I wish to inform the gentleman from Maryland that I am not on the other side of the House. I still remain on this side; he is the one who has crossed over.

Mr. McLANE. I referred to the gentleman as sitting on that side when he called for the reading of the resolution. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to read again to the House that resolution, as it was read yesterday for its information, but which I have now modified and had read to the House in its modified form:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be discharged from the further consideration of House bill H. R. No. 5265, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Now, that resolution was read yesterday for the information of the House, and I submit as a question of privilege that inasmuch as a bill that had been referred or committed—

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. May I inquire if that was not the resolution offered by Mr. SIMONTON, and not by the gentleman from Maryland, which is printed on page 28 of the RECORD?

Mr. BLOUNT. The RECORD says so.

Mr. SIMONTON. No, the RECORD says that it was read at my request.

Mr. McLANE. It was read for the information of the House.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman from Maryland yield to me for a question?

Mr. McLANE. Not now.

Mr. FINLEY. I merely wish to ask a question for information.

Mr. McLANE. When I have made my own statement I will answer the gentleman with pleasure.

I submit to the House as a question of privilege that the Journal being read and giving to the House the information that that bill had been referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and inasmuch as it was a bill which, under the rules, approved by the judgment of this House, should go to the Committee on Ways and Means, and as a motion to reconsider the reference of any bill which had been referred was not in order and could not be entertained under the rules of this House—that when the Journal of the House was read and when it appeared an improper reference had been made, quite independently of how that improper reference was made, whether by an individual, or by the Speaker, or by the Clerk, it was the right of the House and the duty of the House, before approving the Journal, to execute its rules by directing the proper reference.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. McLANE. I will hear it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. If it be decided to be a question of privilege to change the reference of this bill, would it not be a question of privilege for any other gentleman to move to change the reference of any other bill which has been referred? If this be decided a question of privilege, may not my friend from Florida as a question of privilege move to refer to the Committee on Ways and Means any other bill which has been otherwise referred?

Mr. McLANE. The very point I made, Mr. Speaker, was that the rules of this House do not permit the reference of a bill to be reconsidered where the bill has been referred or committed; and the House will perceive that if the House did permit a reference to be reconsidered, any bill might be brought here, referred by being put into the box or by being indorsed on the back by the member presenting it, then reconsidered and brought before the House for consideration, without going to a committee at all.

The House has forbidden that. The House has provided by rule what class of bills shall go to particular committees. The Journal of its proceedings is read; and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] does not say, and I take it no other man will say, the reading of the Journal and its approval by the Speaker is an approval by the House, whatever difference of opinion we may have as to whether the Journal of yesterday should be read before the Journal of the day before has been read. I admit the Journal of yesterday and the Journal of the day before must be approved by this House; the Speaker approves it himself before he has it read to the House; that is the ordinary routine of business, and by the new rule he is required to approve it before it is read. Under the old rule it was read without the approval of the Speaker, but the approval of the Speaker by the new rule is given to it before it is read. That was deemed wise and judicious as a rule of the House in regard to making up its Journal. But no man supposes it takes away from the House its right to approve the Journal after it is approved by the Speaker and read at the desk by the Clerk. And the practice of the House under the new rule is precisely what the practice was under the old rule. The Journal is read, having been approved by the Speaker; then the Speaker allows it to stand approved by the House, unless objection is taken.

Well, if a gentleman rises to take exception to the Journal of the day before yesterday just as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] rose to take exception to it, the Journal is in this position, that it has been approved by the Speaker and read to the House, but not approved by the House. And before it is approved by the House I submit as a question of privilege that it is my right to have the bill referred according to the rules, and not as indicated by the indorsement of the member presenting it. I do not admit that the presentation of the bill was accompanied with the unanimous consent of the House to the improper reference.

Now, I find a bill which has been referred not in accordance with the rules. I am not to go into an inquiry to ascertain how this improper reference was made. I am not called upon to take any part as between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND]; and I think it would be unworthy of me to be deterred in doing my duty in a parliamentary line of procedure because this or that disagreeable personal incident has been injected into our proceedings, or because some gentlemen choose to raise the issue of the tariff or any other economical question.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland a question.

Mr. FINLEY. I have been waiting for some time for the gentleman from Maryland to yield to me for a question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY.]

Mr. McLANE. I would not be doing myself justice if I did not make an explanation of why I have submitted this question before I occupy myself with questions which gentlemen may desire to address to me. I am doing my duty when I explain why it is I submit this question of privilege; and I do not propose to say a word more than that. I consider it absolutely necessary to explain my own proceeding, inasmuch as the Journal of the day before yesterday is now before us, having been read and not having been approved by the House. Now, I am not willing to approve the Journal of the day before yesterday as it stands. I find upon it a reference of a bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws—

Mr. MORRISON. And was not that reference made?

Mr. SIMONTON. How do you know it was wrongly made?

Mr. McLANE. I shall not say it was wrongly made. I shall concede to my honorable friend before me that it was made in pursuance of the current rule of the House; but until the House approve the Journal the reference is not conclusive—

Mr. ATHERTON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question right there.

Mr. McLANE. Let me answer first the questions which have already been addressed to me. There is a rule of the House that bills may be introduced by members on Monday, and sent to the Clerk's desk for reference, the reference being then made by the Speaker and the Clerk acting under the direction of the Speaker of this House at the time of presentation, and not, in my judgment, by the vote. That reference was actually made; and that is why I could not vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, who would so amend the Journal as to show that the reference was not made. I think that reference was made; but I submit to the House that that reference was improperly made, and not in conformity with the rule of this House. That is the point I make.

Mr. ATHERTON. If the privileges of the House were not abused in any way, how is it claimed that any question of privilege now comes in here?

Mr. McLANE. My answer to that, whether satisfactory or not, is very simple. My answer is that this House has prescribed for itself certain rules of proceeding. It is its duty to enforce all those rules, to maintain the integrity of its proceedings and the collective privileges of its members. If the Clerk, or the Speaker, or an individual member by his individual indorsement causes a reference of a bill to be entered on the Journal which is an improper reference under our rules the House should direct a proper reference before approving the Journal.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Can an individual member refer a bill?

Mr. McLANE. Surely not.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Then why did you say so?

Mr. McLANE. I did not say so.

Mr. HUTCHINS. That is what you said—"if an individual member refers a bill."

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman does not understand me. A word of explanation will suffice. An individual member introduces a bill, either through the petition-box or by sending it to the desk on Monday, and indorses upon it a reference.

Mr. HUTCHINS. In this case the member introduced a bill in the open House, and it was read; the record shows that it was read, and the House referred it to a committee.

Mr. McLANE. That is all right. We are not at issue on the fact of presentation, but I contend that the reference was not then made by the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman—

Mr. McLANE. Let me first answer the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HUTCHINS.] We are not at issue on the fact of presentation in the House.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Then let us keep to the fact. If the gentleman will argue on the facts, he will come back and say that he is all wrong.

Mr. McLANE. I am willing to adhere to the facts. The gentleman from New York says, that although the indorsement on the bill might have been by a member, yet the actual reference was made by the House.

Mr. HUTCHINS. That is so.

Mr. McLANE. So it was, in so far as the officers of the House acted. When they act they are supposed to act for the House. But the gentleman from New York fails to notice the gist of this whole question. It is that when our Journal is read to us and we find that we are not willing to let the action of the officers of the House be our action, we so resolve. That is all there is in this question; and it is the only mode of maintaining the collective privileges of members of this House or the integrity of its proceedings.

The Speaker and the Clerk have made a reference in conformity with the indorsed reference, and when the Journal is read and no objection is taken to it, the reference by the Speaker and the Clerk is the reference of the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] a question right here. It will not divert him at all from his argument, for it is right in the line of it. Rule XIX cites in detail questions of privilege. It reads:

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings.

Mr. McLANE. That is the point.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now I ask the gentleman if that language covers the proposition he now makes, to wit, that the wrong reference of a bill is a question of privilege?

Mr. McLANE. That is the point of objection and the only point of objection which I can conceive in this case; that the words "integrity of its proceedings" go to—what shall I call it? Some say fraud.

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman allow me to say upon that point a word?

Mr. McLANE. Certainly.

Mr. CARLISLE. I submit to my friend from Maryland that the phrase "integrity of its proceedings" means simply the unity, the completeness, and the truth of the proceedings of the House. When the proceedings of the House, as recorded by the Clerk under the direction of its presiding officer, do truthfully and correctly show what actually occurred, there can be no question of privilege about it.

Mr. McLANE. Very well.

Mr. CARLISLE. But when a gentleman arises in his place on this floor and says that according to his recollection of the transaction the proceedings as recorded do not show the truth of the transaction, then a question of privilege is raised under Rule IX of the House, and under no other circumstances whatever. I submit that to my friend from Maryland, as a lawyer, as being the true construction of Rule No. IX.

Mr. McLANE. If that narrow construction is given to the words "integrity of its proceedings," then no correction—

Mr. CARLISLE. Yes, I admit that a correction can be made.

Mr. McLANE. No correction of an erroneous reference is possible. Now I submit to the gentleman from Kentucky that if he will give his attention to the whole body of these rules he will find how pertinent is the point made here to a bill introduced in the House. When we come to a bill in the petition-box, of which we get no knowledge at all from the Journal—

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. There is no such thing as putting a bill in the petition-box.

Mr. McLANE. Pardon me.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Petitions go into the box.

Mr. McLANE. Petitions accompanied by bills, and praying the adoption of such bills. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] ought not to forget that that was the first ruling in this Congress, and the petition-box has been crammed with bills going through that box to the committees of the House under the rules of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Not under the new rules—under the old rules.

Mr. McLANE. Yes, under the new as under the old. Now in the new rules you will find a provision that when any motion or proposition of any kind put into the box has been improperly referred, there is an obligation imposed upon the committee to report it back for proper reference.

Mr. HUTCHINS. But this bill was never put into the box at all.

Mr. McLANE. I am aware of that. A bill introduced upon the floor of the House goes upon the Journal, and the House has knowledge of it—has power to make the proper reference if an improper one has been made. But the House has no knowledge of a bill that goes into the box; and therefore these new rules have provided that when a bill does go into the box and is improperly referred, the committee to which it has improperly gone shall bring it back to the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Let me correct the gentleman. The rule makes no such provision. The rule does provide for a petition or memorial going through the box. A bill is not a petition.

Mr. McLANE. I am talking of a bill accompanied by a petition, a petition praying for the passage of a bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I beg the gentleman to bear in mind that the revised rules do not contemplate the reference of bills through the box to committees.

Mr. McLANE. The gentleman from Kentucky will pardon me—the old and new rules are alike on this point. With all deference to him as chairman of the Committee on Rules, not ex officio but de facto—

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman is mistaken again. I have not that distinguished honor. I am the last-named democratic member of the committee.

Mr. McLANE. Nevertheless, the gentleman was de facto chairman of that committee, so far as the passage through the House of these new rules are concerned. It was under the gentleman's auspices that these new rules were adopted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I accept that responsibility; but I know the gentleman from Maryland cherishes the same prejudice that I do against the term de facto.

Mr. McLANE. Well, as we live in days when we have no other than de facto authority, I should be very unreasonable to have any prejudice against it.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether Rule XXI does not provide that the only way in which post-route bills and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors can be introduced is through the petition-box.

Mr. BLACKBURN. There are those excepted bills, but that is a mere quibble. The gentleman from Michigan knows that that does not apply here. There are certain bills allowed to go through the petition-box like petitions or memorials, but no bill of a general legislative character or purport is permitted to find its way to a committee through that box. The exception noted by the gentleman from Michigan does not affect this rule at all.

Mr. CONGER. But the gentleman knows that last session hundreds of bills were referred in that way.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That was under the old rule, not under the present rule.

Mr. CALKINS. Under the present rule is there any prohibition against other bills passing through the box as they did during the extra session?

Mr. BLACKBURN. There is no permission given, and there is what amounts to an express prohibition by the naming of the bills excepted from the general rule—post-route bills and river and harbor bills. These only are allowed to go through that box.

Mr. CALKINS. During the extra session there was a provision in the rules that bills relating to post-routes and to rivers and harbors should be referred through the box; there was, then, a class of excepted bills; yet other bills were referred through the box. My point is that there is now no provision in the rules whereby other bills may not go through the box, if accompanied by petitions.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No bill can go through the petition-box unless it belongs to the excepted classes just referred to. If the gentleman will look at the rule he will find that express provision is made for the introduction of bills whether by individual members or by committees. A committee may bring in a bill framed or predicated upon a petition or memorial. Express provision is made for the introduction of bills by an individual member or by a committee. An exception is made in regard to the classes of bills alluded to by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] which for the convenience of the House and to save printing are allowed, as none others are allowed, to pass through the petition-box.

Mr. CALKINS. I appreciate the point the gentleman makes. The present rules provide as he states; but I fail to see the difference between the old rules and the new in that regard. The old rules and the new substantially agree on this subject; and we all know that under the old rules bills accompanied by petitions went into the petition-box.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The only point I make is that no member of this House can get any bill before any committee, whether standing or select, if it shall not belong to one of those excepted classes, unless he introduces it here in open House and it is so referred.

Mr. CALKINS. I understood the gentleman but dissented from him, because I do not understand the rules as he interprets them.

Mr. McLANE. I shall not occupy the time of the House any further. I make the point to the House the Journal of day before yesterday on being read, having been approved by the Speaker and read to the House in pursuance of the first rule, reveals to me the reference of a certain bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws which I think under the rules of this House ought to go to the Committee on Ways and Means. I believe it to be my privilege before I approve that Journal to see a proper reference is made. It applies no more to this than to a multitude of cases which can occur. I do not choose to sit here and see a reference made which I know to be an improper reference under the rule, with no relief except what may come from the committee to which that bill has been improperly referred. I care not whether the reference results through the negligence of the officers of the House, through the design of the officers of the House, through the inadvertence of the officers of the House, it is my right and privilege to move the reference of the bill as the rules require; and, sir, that is the only point I make.

Mr. ROBESON. Will the gentleman permit me before he sits down?

Mr. McLANE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBESON. This is a question of privilege, and it must come under Rule IX or not at all. Now, then, any question affecting the rights of this House collectively clearly is a question of privilege under that rule; for that is the express language of the rule. It is the right of this House, as a House collectively, when it intrusts its action to an individual agent, to have its rules properly conformed to by the agent who acts for it. There are two kinds of proceedings here. One kind is submitted to the consideration and the action of the House. When the House considers and acts upon business, that closes it out except under formal reconsideration. But there is another kind of proceedings of the House which, for the sake of convenience, is allowed to go in the first instance and without investigation, according to the direction given by the person who introduces it. If under the action intrusted to an individual acting in the first instance such proceeding has been taken as does not conform to the rules of the House, then it concerns the House collectively to see that its rules are conformed to by the individual intrusted to act for them; or that, if he desires a different action, he submits it to the House. Therefore it is a question of high privilege in this House that its pro forma action, which it submits to its confidence, not in the honor but in the judgment of individual members, shall be made right when the question comes up.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. ROBESON. I suggest nothing against the honor of the gentleman from Illinois. I do not believe he did anything which was liable to censure as a dishonorable act. I believe he had a mistaken idea of the effect of the rules of this House, and that he used an indistinct and uncertain rule to accomplish a purpose which this House did not mean he should use it for, and that he acted under this authority to proceed, in the first instance, in a way to commit the House in the first instance to his own mistake, and now, he having acted under a false idea of the rules, against the real will and intention of the House, and ignoring the true meaning of its rules, it is a question of the highest privilege, concerning the action of the whole House and its rights as a House collectively, that its collective action, now acting affirmatively on the subject, shall rectify the individual mistake of the gentleman from Illinois when acting as its agent, and make that action conform to its own idea of its own rules. Thus there is a high privileged question, to the end that the House collectively has the right to rectify the wrong position in which it was put by its action under the individual action of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MILLS rose.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman from Maryland said he would yield to me.

Mr. McLANE. Certainly I will.

Mr. MILLS. The Chair has recognized me.

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to call—

Mr. MILLS. There are two gentlemen to whom I have promised to yield the floor.

Mr. FINLEY. Before the gentleman from Maryland takes his seat, I desire to call his attention to the point of order I make, and it is this: When the gentleman on yesterday submitted his proposition to the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] demanded the previous question, which was seconded, and the Speaker then expressed a doubt as to whether he could entertain the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland pending the demand for the previous question, which had been ordered. I read from the remarks of the Speaker:

The Chair considers that that would be a solution of the difficulty, but he is not clear that the question of privilege can be raised at this time against the operation of the previous question, which the House has ordered.

That was the status of this case yesterday. Then my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] undertook to withdraw his demand for the previous question, to which the gentleman from Illinois objected; and in that condition of the case we quit yesterday. I will raise the point of order when the gentleman from Maryland gets through, that no proposition can be put pending the demand for the previous question. If the gentleman desires to discuss that, I will only ask him the question.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman from Maryland yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. McLANE. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maryland yields to me for a moment.

Mr. McLANE. I did not understand that I was expected to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Ohio; but I wish to say to him that the point he makes to-day was made on yesterday, that I could not present this question before the House, the previous question having been demanded. If the gentleman will refer to the RECORD, he will find that the proposition was read for information, in order that the Speaker might decide whether it superseded the demand for the previous question or not. The Speaker declined to decide the question and submitted it to the House as to whether it presented a question of privilege or not, and the House voted upon it.

Now, if the gentleman had read the RECORD a little further on, he would have found that no quorum voted on that question, and the House then adjourned; so that the question is now pending.

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman will allow me a word further, as I understand it, the Speaker did not decide that this question of privilege had precedence of the previous question. That question the Speaker said he would decide, but it has not yet been decided, and the question that the Speaker would now put is as to the question of privilege. Now, I raise the point that the previous question being demanded precludes the gentleman from Maryland from offering his resolution.

Mr. McLANE. But I submit to the gentleman that that point in our proceedings has already been passed, and the House has voted on the question.

Mr. FINLEY. But not as to whether it had precedence of another privileged motion—

Mr. McLANE. Certainly, as to whether the House would entertain the motion as a question of privilege rising beyond the demand for the previous question, and the House voted, ayes 105, noes a small number—I do not remember exactly. At all events the point was made that no quorum had voted, and shortly afterward the House adjourned.

Mr. ATHERTON. How can we find that out unless we have the Journal?

Mr. McLANE. The RECORD of yesterday shows that this was read for information.

Mr. FINLEY. I read from a document which purports to be a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McLANE. The reason I yield is because I understand that I am proceeding by consent, and that when I close the previous question is pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this question should be properly discussed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to explain in as brief a time as possible why this question is not one of privilege. And in order that it may be understood I desire the Clerk to read from the Journal the proceedings of Monday last, in reference to the introduction of the bill by my colleague from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. TOWNSHEND: A bill (H. R. No. 5265) to revise and amend sections 2503, 2504, and 2505 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, I desire to have read the text of the bill which my colleague introduced on that occasion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That sections 2503, 2504, and 2505 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be revised and amended so that the duty on salt, printing-type, printing-paper, and the chemicals and materials used in the manufacture of printing-paper, be repealed, and that said articles be placed on the free list.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now this is the bill which was referred under the rules of the House to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. CONGER. Let me correct the gentleman. There is no such committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. On the Revision and Codification of the Laws.

Mr. CONGER. Not even that.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then what is it? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. The Revision and Codification of the Statutes of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. FINLEY. It ought to be the Laws of the United States.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well that is a nice point. The statutes were formerly laws, but are now disregarded it seems.

I desire now to present this question to the House, and ask its judgment, whether it was not competent for the House on Monday last on a motion to refer this bill to a different committee to have referred it to the Committee on the Revision and Codification of the Statutes of the United States?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. If the committee report this bill back to the House, has not the House the power to recommit it to another committee?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. If they never report it back to the House no harm is done. If they do report it back, the House can do as it pleases in reference to it, either by recommitting it, or rejecting the recommendation that may accompany it from the committee reporting it?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly, so I understand.

Now, in order to show I was not in error, as suggested by the gentleman from Michigan, in speaking of this committee, I will state that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws is the one named in the rule, as will be found in Rule X of the revised rules of this House, page 7; from which it will be seen that I was right before.

Now, I recur to the question whether it was not competent for the House on Monday last to have referred this bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws or whether a majority of this House when the bill is again reported to the House may not refer it to any other committee the majority of the House may determine. The Speaker has ruled over and over again that the question as to the submission of a bill is for the judgment of the House, and when the House has decided that question it is the decision of the House as to the proper committee. Now, then, there can be no doubt of that question. This bill under the rules of the House was referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. Can this bill then be taken from that committee by a motion to discharge the committee from its further consideration and commit it to another committee without a suspension of the rules? That is the question. I maintain that it cannot be taken from this committee. The bill has gone from the House. The House under its rules has adjudicated the question of reference and placed the bill in the hands of this particular committee, and if the Clerk has done his duty that committee has it now, and if there had been a morning hour might have reported it back to this House this morning, having jurisdiction of it by the action of the House under the rules of the House.

Mr. NEW. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will hear it.

Mr. NEW. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. Is it his opinion that the word "revision," as used in the designation of the Committee on "Revision of the Laws," has the same meaning or is in any way a synonym for the word "amendment?"

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer the gentleman's question. That would be a very proper argument to present to the House when the bill was referred why it should be referred to another committee. But this bill provides for the revision and amendment of the tariff laws, and if the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was a proper committee in the judgment of this House to which the bill might be or should be referred, the committee would have jurisdiction of it after its reference.

Mr. NEW. The gentleman has not answered my question. It is this: Is the word "revision" synonymous with the word "amendment?"

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course not; but the bill contains both terms—both "revision" and "amendment."

I recur to the question again whether, if this bill was properly referred under the rules of the House to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, as the House had a right to refer it, and if that was done in open session, when any gentleman could have raised a question as to how it should be referred if he had desired, the title having been read and indicating the object of the bill to be to amend and revise certain sections of the Revised Statutes, it can now be a question of privilege to change the reference. It was competent for any gentleman to call for the reading of the bill, and upon the reading of it he would have found the bill had reference simply to the revision and amendment of the law as to the duty on salt, paper, and printing-type, and of materials that enter into the manufacture of paper. Then it would have been proper for any gentleman to move a different reference. That was not done, but under the rules of the House the bill went to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. Now, having gone there, does the question of getting it away from that committee involve "the dignity," the "safety," or the "integrity of the proceedings" of this House?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Maine says yes.

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SPRINGER. Where in the reference of this bill was our safety involved? Where was our dignity involved? Where was our integrity or the integrity of the proceedings of this House involved?

Mr. REED. It is utterly impossible to furnish eyes to people who do not have them.

Mr. SPRINGER. I say the proceedings of the House on Monday not having violated the dignity or offended against the safety or destroyed the integrity of our proceedings, we cannot reach this bill except by a motion on Monday to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee on the Revision of the Laws from its consideration, thus bringing it back to the House and then referring it to another committee; or by waiting until the Committee on the Revision of the Laws shall report it back to the House and then immediately on their report being submitted any gentleman may rise and move a reference of the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means and the majority of the House can then control the matter. Any other movement would be revolutionary and would destroy entirely that harmony which has prevailed heretofore in the administration of our rules and set a precedent for overriding the plainest provisions of parliamentary law, which I trust this House for the sake of accomplishing a purpose will not do.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. McLANE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. OSCAR TURNER.]

Mr. CALKINS. Will the gentleman from Maryland allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLS. I desire to know how much time the gentleman from Maryland is entitled to.

Mr. GARFIELD. He is speaking by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not restricting debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. The debate is running by unanimous consent.

Mr. McLANE. The reason I have any time, I believe, is that it was the understanding I should move the previous question. I am now yielding the time I have in that way to gentlemen to the extent of my hour.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. I desire to occupy a few moments only. We have been engaged in the consideration of this question now ever since yesterday morning, and we seem to be no nearer a conclusion than when we first commenced it. In fact there seems to be so much excitement created on this floor that we are getting deeper into the entanglement and confusion.

What I rose to say was simply this: I desire we should progress with the public business and proceed to the consideration of the pending appropriation bill and get rid of this question. I will concede, and I suppose every fair-minded man will concede, that there is a majority on this floor who would have given a direction to this bill different from that which the gentleman from Illinois gave it. There is no question, if their attention had been drawn to it, a majority of the House would have sent the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means. But it took a different course. Now why should we consume all this time in discussion when there is a division in sentiment and both parties seem disinclined to yield to the other and resort to all sorts of parliamentary tactics to delay a decision of this question?

What will you gentlemen who are in favor of a protective tariff gain if you change the reference of this bill? What will you lose if it remains where it has gone? When the Committee on Revision of Laws report it back to this House it will then be in possession of the House, and a motion to refer it to the Committee on Ways and Means will then be in order. Then I appeal to gentlemen of the majority on the other side who are protective-tariff men, why not let the question be settled by leaving the bill where it has gone, and in this way put an end to this question, so that we can proceed with the business of the House? You yield nothing; you lose no privilege. It will be in the power of the majority, when the committee reports the bill back to the House, to refer it to any other committee they please; and if the committee never reports it back, then that will be the end of it. I believe in yielding to the majority, whenever there is a majority in this House upon any question, provided they proceed in accordance with the rules. I for one do not like to obstruct legislative action. Although I am opposed to a protective tariff, and will go as far as any man to give relief to the people by modification of tariff duties, and have introduced some bills for that purpose, I believe the majority ought to control. When they have duly deliberated upon any question let them answer to their constituents. I have made these suggestions solely to bring about a settlement, that we may get rid of this question without a violation of our rules and with due regard to the correctness of the record.

Mr. McLANE. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.]

Mr. MILLS. The true germ of this controversy lies much deeper than any gentleman has yet sounded in his argument. Why all this tempest about the reference of a bill? During the seven years I have had the honor to occupy a seat on this floor, I have never before witnessed such a scene. I have repeatedly known bills referred to committees, and when those committees came to consider them, they determined they had been improperly referred to them, and accordingly they brought the bills back into the House for the proper reference. I never before have seen such an upheaval of the waters as we have witnessed here yesterday and to-day. Let us pause and ask why?

This is not a question in regard to the Committee of Ways and Means and the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, as to the prerogatives of the one or the other of those committees. There is something that lies deeper than that. What is it? There are two committees in this House, one of which is so organized that a bill reducing taxation upon the people of the United States will be reported by that committee back to this House for consideration. The other committee is so organized that it would bury such a bill so deep that the trump of the resurrection will not wake it. On the one side the effort is to get this bill into a committee that will bring it back into the House for consideration. The effort on the other side is to get it into a committee where it will be irretrievably buried forever. That is the controversy.

Now, cannot the gentlemen of the majority, who oppose cutting down the duties on the woolen shirts that warm the bodies of the poor toiling laborers of this country, come up like men and vote to keep the tariff there, when the bill comes into the House? Cannot those who want to keep the duties amounting to 120 per cent. on iron, with which the laborer toils for his daily subsistence, come up like men and vote to keep that taxation on that labor when the bill comes back here? Do they want to keep the high duties on trace-chains, axes, hoes, and other implements made of iron? Why do they fail to meet that question like men? Because they want to put the question on a false issue before the people of the United States; to say that they are contending simply for regularity of proceedings in this House. That is all. They do not want to face the music and vote on questions of that sort and tell the toiling people of this country that they have voted to take off the taxes on wealth, on incomes, on capital invested in manufactures that pay a profit of over 40 per cent. per annum, and pile it all upon consumption, upon that which the poor eat and drink and wear. That is the issue before us. One committee will bring this bill before the House; the other committee will bury it.

We have heard a great deal about dishonor. Why, sir, a member of this House had a right to refer this bill to a committee which was friendly to its consideration, if the rules of the House granted him that right. He asked it and the House so referred it. Mr. Speaker, it does seem to me that the extreme sensitiveness about honor which we have witnessed upon this floor ought to make gentlemen feel some compunctious visitations of conscience when they deliberate upon a proposition laid upon your table to make the record of the American Congress utter a falsehood. Is it a question of privilege of the American Congress that its record should be made to utter a falsehood.

This is not a Government friendly to privilege. From the foundation of the Government to the present time it has been a favorite cry of the people of the United States, "down with privileges; equal rights to all men, and exclusive privileges to none." We are told that it is a question of privilege, by the machinery of this House, to stifle the investigation of questions of taxation, and to keep the bodies of the toiling people of the United States prostrated in the dust.

Mr. MORRISON. And to make our record lie.

Mr. McLANE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. I have listened to this nearly two days' discussion with wonder, because the question to my mind has seemed to be so simple as to preclude a diversity of opinion. It is a question of good faith, and, to accept the language of the gentleman from Texas, one of honor. The rules of this House specify in plain language the committees to which bills shall be referred. Among them is the following:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely: Subjects relating—

2. To the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States, to the Committee on Ways and Means.

That rule is a law binding as any other part of the law that members swear to maintain, and is binding on the conscience of members. Yet we have the gentleman whose action is under consideration saying, as his remarks appear in the RECORD, that he gave the reference of a tariff bill—for he and not the House referred it—to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws for the express purpose of evading the law as embodied in the rule I have quoted.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman to say—

Mr. KELLEY. I will quote the gentleman's language. He said:

My purpose was to send that bill to a committee which would make a report to this House, so that a majority of the people, &c.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I repeat that statement.

Mr. KELLEY. Sir, a committee may have been constituted in a manner satisfactory to the majority of this House or unsatisfactory to a majority of its members. But in neither event are members relieved from allegiance to the law. At the end of this Congress that committee can be reconstituted. Elections for the popular branch of Congress give the people opportunity to revise our policy once in two years; and gentlemen may trust to the law and bide their time. But for a member of this House to evade the law and claim and boldly proclaim that he did it because a committee of the House had not been constituted to his taste is to violate the law and assign an unholy reason for the act.

Mr. McLANE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not seek the floor for the purpose of entering upon a general discussion of the merits of the question; but I submit there is no court of record in the country so humble that it has not the right to correct its own record when it has been led into gross error—I will not say through fraud, but through simple mistake. Suppose that judgment has been entered in a wrong case, or that a wrong case has been struck off the docket through similarity of names, the court will go back and correct its record. So I say the Congress of the United States with all its great powers has the right of an ordinary court of justice to make its record read as it ought to read.

But I may waive the point of amending or correcting the record. I place myself upon the highest grounds of privilege. This House has been led into a great mistake—into a violation of its own rules. I, as one member, if I stood alone, have the right to call upon the House to conform to its rules in a matter of so great importance. If I can offer an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Maryland, I desire to do so now. Can I offer it, Mr. Speaker, at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I give notice that I shall do so whenever the opportunity may arise; and the gentleman from Maryland kindly says to me that, if he can, he will give me that opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland is not before the House, and hence not open to amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. But the gentleman says I may give notice of my proposition.

Mr. McLANE. Let it come in, and the previous question can operate upon both.

The SPEAKER. The question of privilege must first be disposed of favorably.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask that my proposition be read as part of my remarks for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in referring on Monday to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws the bill for the revision and amendment of sections 2503, 2504, and 2505 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the House acted under a misapprehension of the character of the bill and in contravention of the rules; and it hereby discharges said committee from the further consideration of said bill and refers it to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. McLANE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY.]

Mr. FINLEY. When the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] yesterday had his proposition read for information the previous question was operating. I now make the point of order that pending the operation of the previous question the Speaker cannot stop the proceedings of the House to put a proposition whether something else is a question of privilege or not. In other words, pending the operation of the previous question the vote cannot be delayed in order that the Speaker may submit to the House whether some other matter is a question of privilege. Upon this subject I send to the Clerk's desk to be read remarks which I find in a document called the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD—remarks purporting to have been made by the Speaker of this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question of order is whether the previous question, having been ordered on the pending question as authorized by the rule just read, can now be interrupted by the operation of Rule IX, which relates to questions of privilege; the gentleman from Maryland drawing the attention of the Chair to the clause of the rule which says, "and the integrity of its proceedings." The Chair considers that would be a solution of the difficulty, but he is not clear that that question of privilege can be raised at this time as against the operation of the previous question which the House has ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland bases the question of privilege which he presents on the words of the rule "integrity of its proceedings." The Chair thinks that that question primarily presented might have involved a question of privilege, but the Chair is not called upon now to decide whether it is a higher question than the execution of the previous question that has been ordered by the House; but the Chair is quite willing to submit the question to the House whether this does involve a question of privilege and has a right to come in now.

Mr. FINLEY. Now, the Chair said yesterday that he was not called upon to decide whether the proposition presented was a higher question or not. I make the point of order that it is not a higher question than the previous question, and that the Chair cannot interrupt the operation of the previous question by submitting to the House a proposition as to whether something else is a question of privilege or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not read the entire proceeding—

Mr. McLANE. The point of order is not made now, but is to be made later.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is using the point of order in the nature of an argument.

Mr. McLANE. And he has consumed his three minutes. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Ohio on my left.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to read his own remarks further on. If the gentleman from Ohio had read further on he would have found the position of the Chair entirely consistent. The Chair will read:

The Chair submits to the House whether it is a question of privilege. It is not yet permitted to come before the House, but he merely submits whether it contains a question of privilege or not.

Mr. WARNER. My only difficulty on this question of privilege turns on the point made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] It is this: was the reference of this bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws made in pursuance of the rules? That is, could it have been so referred under the rules either by the Speaker or by a majority of the House itself? If it could be or was so referred, then it was not in contravention of the rules, but in order under the rules; and in that case this question cannot be now one of privilege. But if, on the other hand, the reference was in contravention of the rules and would have required a two-thirds vote of the House, or, it being the fourth Monday, unanimous consent, to suspend the rules in order rightly to make that reference, then this is clearly a question of privilege. And I should like very much, if it be in order, to have the ruling of the Speaker on that very question; that is, whether the bill in question rightly could have been referred under the rules to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will now submit the question whether the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland is privileged.

Mr. McLANE. But I demand the previous question.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is holding the floor by permission of the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. FINLEY. But I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot make a point of order in the time of another gentleman who yielded to him for debate.

Mr. FINLEY. I make the point of order—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland has demanded the previous question.

Mr. McLANE. I wish to modify my proposition.

Mr. FINLEY. I make the point of order on the gentleman's proposition.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is not before the House. The question before the House is whether the proposition he asks to present involves a question of privilege.

Mr. FINLEY. On this I make the point of order that the Chair cannot submit that to the House pending the operation of the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House has voted several times in a manner to instruct him to submit it in the manner the Chair has stated.

Mr. McLANE. Read for information, Mr. Clerk. [Cries of "No!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio has demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 135, nays 98, not voting 59; as follows:

So the motion was agreed to.

The following additional pairs were read from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. HEILMAN with Mr. POEHLER.

Mr. WELLBORN with Mr. THOMAS.

Mr. JONES with Mr. JOYCE.

Mr. HARMER with Mr. WHITTHORNE.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland has been declared by a vote of the House to be a question of privilege.

Mr. McLANE. I desire to have read the modified proposition, and then to demand the previous question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I demand a division of the question. Let it be read.

The SPEAKER. The proposition which the House has declared by its vote to be a question of privilege will now be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House being of opinion that the reference of House bill No. 5265 to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was incorrect under its rules, doth resolve that the said committee be discharged from its further consideration and the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I demand a division of the question.

The SPEAKER. In what part?

Mr. BLACKBURN. First in reference to discharging the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, to which this bill has already been referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he knows the point at which the gentleman from Kentucky wishes to stop.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Read the resolution and I will name where I desire the division to be made. If the Clerk will read, I will indicate the place where I ask a division.

The preamble and resolutions were again read.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That question, Mr. Speaker, is certainly susceptible of division into three parts. First I demand a separate vote on the preamble to the resolution, which declares the reference to be improper; then I demand a separate vote on that part of the proposition which discharges the Committee on Revision of the Laws from further consideration of this matter; and I also demand a separate vote on the concluding portion of the motion, referring the matter to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MILLS. In order that the House may understand correctly what is to be voted upon, I ask for the reading of Mr. TOWNSEND'S bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to reserve a further point of order to this effect, that the discharge of a committee of this House from the consideration of a bill is not a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when it is presented. The Chair recognizes the right of division of this question.

Mr. MILLS. And I ask that the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 5265) to revise and amend sections 2503, 2504, and 2505 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Be it enacted, &c., That sections 2503, 2504, and 2505 of title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be revised and amended so that the duty on salt, printing-type, printing-paper, and the chemicals and materials used in the manufacture of printing-paper be repealed, and that said articles be placed on the free list.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland to demand the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to ask the gentleman to yield a moment to me, in order to offer an amendment to his motion, to strike out from his resolution the "Committee on Ways and Means" and insert the "Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union," so that we may have the sense of the House on that question as to whether this shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole or to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. McLANE. I decline to yield for an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the matter go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland demands the previous question.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment before the previous question is seconded, to allow that amendment to be inserted.

Mr. McLANE. I decline to yield. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 65, noes 125.

Mr. BLACKBURN, and Mr. SINGLETON of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 64, nays 164, not voting 64; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Mr. BEALE with Mr. YOCUM, for the day, on the tariff question.

Mr. STEPHENS with Mr. ACKLEN.

Mr. JONES with Mr. JOYCE, on all questions for the remainder of the day.

Mr. ROBESON with Mr. WILSON.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] demands the previous question on his resolution. As many as are in favor of ordering the previous question will say "ay."

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move that the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland be referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. I believe this is in order under the rules. It is provided in clause 2 of Rule XVII—

It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to commit. The question is on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MILLS. Would the motion to lay the resolution on the table have precedence of the demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order before or after the previous question shall have been ordered.

Mr. MILLS. Then I move to lay the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland on the table.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOTT. Does the motion to lay on the table take precedence of a vote on the demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It is in order before or after the ordering of the previous question.

Mr. KNOTT. I prefer to have the sense of the House tested on that question before the previous question is ordered.

Mr. MILLS. Then make that motion.

Mr. KNOTT. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question being put on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, there were—ayes 72, noes 107.

Mr. MCKENZIE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 98, nays 137, not voting 57; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Mr. ROBINSON with Mr. SPARKS until eight o'clock to-day.

Mr. FROST with Mr. VALENTINE.

Mr. BREWER with Mr. CABELL until eight o'clock to-day.

Mr. DAVIDSON and Mr. BOWMAN, withdrawn, and Mr. ERRETT is paired with Mr. DAVIDSON.

Mr. MCKENZIE with Mr. McLANE for the remainder of the day.

Mr. HAWK with Mr. HENKLE.

Mr. BAILEY with Mr. MULLER.

Mr. TAYLOR with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. SPEER with Mr. NEWBERRY.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Speaker, no quorum having voted on the call of the yeas and nays, I now ask that proceedings under the call of the House be proceeded with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. CLYMER in the chair.) That would be the regular order, to proceed with the call, and the doors will now be closed.

Mr. TALBOTT. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TALBOTT. My point of order is that under the preceding roll-call a quorum was present. Now, can there be any other call of this House without a majority vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is overruled. The House has ordered the call, and the fact of a quorum appearing does not vitiate the prior order of the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, there has been as yet no order of the House to arrest members absent without leave. I desire, therefore, to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without the leave of the House, and that the Speaker issue his warrant therefor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NEW. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what may be the effect, but I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. HOSTETLER, is absent and not able to be in attendance to-night on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That statement will be in order when the name of the gentleman's colleague is called.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that the list of absentees be called over. Since the last call some gentlemen have come in and some have gone out. Those who come in ought not to be arrested. Those who have gone out should be arrested. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The list of absentees is now being prepared with a view to ascertain who are absent without the leave of the House.

Mr. ATHERTON. At the special request of Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, I agreed to pair with him during the day. I am paired with him on all questions, and he is absent in accordance with that agreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no connection with those proceedings. The order of the House must be executed.

Mr. ATHERTON. I cannot vote if the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON] is not here to vote; and I ask that I be excused from further attendance during the session of to-day. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. KELLEY. We want the pleasure of the gentleman's company.

Mr. ATHERTON. I am very fully convinced that my request will not receive unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair agrees with the gentleman.

Mr. ATHERTON. I therefore withdraw it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Under the rules of the House I believe it is now in order, before the warrant issues, for excuses to be presented.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The roll of absentees will now be called, and those for whom no adequate excuses are offered will be sent for under the order of the House.

The Clerk proceeded to call the list of absentees.

Mr. SCALES.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. My colleague, Mr. SCALES, has been confined yesterday and to-day to his room by sickness, and is unable to be here. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERWIN: No excuse offered.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that my colleague, Mr. SINGLETON, be excused.

The question being put on Mr. STEVENSON'S motion, there were—ayes 36, noes 12.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to say that it is well known to the House that Mr. LAPHAM, of New York, is an aged gentleman, and his health is such as would not justify his being here to-night.

Mr. DUNNELL. I venture to say that the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAPHAM] does not want to be excused on account of ill health.

Mr. PAGE. Or old age either.

Mr. DUNNELL. Or old age, or feebleness; he wants no such excuse.

Mr. O. R. SINGLETON: No excuse offered.

Mr. A. HERR SMITH: No excuse offered.

Mr. STEPHENS.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD: No excuse offered.

Mr. WRIGHT: No excuse offered.

Mr. YOCUM: No excuse offered.

Mr. CASEY YOUNG: No excuse offered.

Mr. THOMAS L. YOUNG: No excuse offered.

Mr. CABELL. I did not notice when the name of Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, was called. It is well known that he has no colleague here who can answer for him, and on account of age and his many infirmities I think he should be excused. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make any motion?

Mr. CABELL. I do not.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I think that my colleague [Mr. O'REILLY] should be excused. He has been absent from the Hall but a few minutes. He left the Hall in order to obtain some refreshments, and coming back to the door he was taken into custody by the Sergeant-at-Arms. I move that he be excused and admitted to the Hall.

Mr. PAGE. I hope not.

Mr. HAWLEY. Oh, no.

Mr. HAYES. He must be brought before the bar of the House.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let him be brought in and give his own excuse.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would inquire what is before the House? A MEMBER. The gentleman from Ohio himself. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The best thing that has been before the House for a month. But I wanted to inquire of the Chair what is the question before the House in connection with the pending call of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is waiting for the Sergeant-at-Arms to report with absent members.

Mr. OSMER. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. OSMER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OSMER. Would a motion to adjourn be now in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the House is in its present condition there are but two motions in order, one a motion to adjourn, and the other a motion to dispense with all other proceedings under the call.

Mr. OSMER, (at eight o'clock p. m.) I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is in order.

The question was taken upon the motion to adjourn; and upon a division there were—ayes 35, noes 43.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in custody the following members, in obedience to the order of the House: Mr. HERBERT, Mr. RICHMOND, Mr. O'REILLY, Mr. DAVIS of California, and Mr. BINGHAM.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. HERBERT, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, I did not know that I was subject to arrest until I reached the door of the House on my return. When I attempted to get into the House I was arrested. My only excuse is that I went off to get my dinner. I came back as soon as I got it.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. CHALMERS. I desire to know how the gentleman voted on the proposition to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That question is hardly in order.

Mr. CHALMERS. It might determine my vote upon excusing the gentleman.

Mr. HERBERT. I voted to adjourn.

The motion of Mr. HUMPHREY to excuse Mr. HERBERT was agreed to; there being—46 in the affirmative, 1 in the negative.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. RICHMOND, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. RICHMOND. I have an excuse, but whether it is a very good one or not I am unable to say; that will rest in the judgment of this House. My case is a little different from that of the gentleman who just rendered his excuse. He says he was not aware that he was arrested until he came here. I am very well assured that I was not arrested until I reached the House. I have been paired for the last ten days with the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. PRESCOTT.] Knowing that my presence would be of no avail so far as legislation was concerned, I absented myself for the purpose of getting my dinner. As soon as I did so I returned, merely as a spectator to observe the proceedings of this honorable body.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to there being ayes 51, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. O'REILLY, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. O'REILLY. I voted three times to adjourn before I left. I went to get my dinner, and returned as soon as I could. I was at the door about half a minute after the doors were closed. This is the only excuse I have to offer.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 46, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. DAVIS, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. DAVIS, of California. Being paired, and therefore unable to participate in legislative proceedings, I went to get my dinner. On my return, I was arrested at the door of the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 40, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. BINGHAM, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, having been in the House from twelve o'clock to-day until half past six, I paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. SHELLEY, until eight o'clock, simply for the purpose of going to dinner. I returned of my own volition.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. SPRINGER. We ought to make an example of somebody.

Mr. TALBOTT. Inasmuch as Pennsylvania needs "protection," I move to excuse the gentleman.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 43, noes 18.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in custody the following members, in obedience to the order of the House: Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware, and Mr. MURCH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. MARTIN, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I have the honor to be the chairman of a sub-committee of the Committee on the District of Columbia. I have been endeavoring for quite a while to get a meeting of that sub-committee but have been unable to obtain a quorum. I had appointed to-night for such a meeting and had invited to the consultations of the committee the engineer commissioner of the District. I left the Hall about half past six o'clock to get some refreshments in order that I might meet the committee at half past seven o'clock. Precisely at that time I was within the Capitol.

Mr. LOUNSBERY. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 35, noes not counted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. MURCH, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MURCH. I have been much broken in my rest for the last two nights; and about four o'clock this afternoon, having a severe headache, I went to my room and lay down. Waking a short time ago I observed a light in the cupola and returned to the House. I was not arrested until I came into this door.

Mr. CONGER. I move the gentleman be excused.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I move he be fined a greenback dollar.

A MEMBER. You mean a fiat dollar.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes not counted.

So Mr. MURCH was excused.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in custody the following members, in obedience to the order of the House: Mr. LEWIS and Mr. HENRY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. LEWIS, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. LEWIS. I left here sick and came back as soon as I felt better, without being notified by anybody. I was not arrested.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. HENRY, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HENRY. I remained here until about six o'clock in the evening, and then left for the purpose of getting something to eat as well as getting my mail at my hotel. I reached here just as the door was closed, and was denied admittance.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move my colleague be excused.

Mr. CONGER. No one in this part of the Hall has heard the excuse given by the gentleman from Maryland.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the fault of the House.

Mr. CONGER. We do not know whether he confesses his absence without rendering any excuse for it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his excuse again.

Mr. HENRY. I stated that I remained here until about six o'clock. I had had nothing to eat since breakfast. I went to my hotel to dine and to get my mail, which was there. I returned almost immediately and reached the Capitol and came to the door of the House shortly after it was closed.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move that my colleague be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SIMONTON. I do not like to put gentlemen to inconvenience, but there is a rule of the House prohibiting smoking. The atmosphere becomes disagreeable when we have to stay here all night.

Several members seconded the motion.

Mr. SIMONTON. I ask the rule be enforced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the rule.

Mr. CONGER. This is an attempt to withdraw the Sergeant-at-Arms from his duty. He has been sent to arrest members and should not be recalled to arrest members for smoking. He is fulfilling the order of the House now.

The Clerk read as follows:

7. While the Speaker is putting a question or addressing the House no member shall walk out of or across the Hall, nor when a member is speaking, pass between him and the Chair; and during the session of the House no member shall wear his hat, or remain by the Clerk's desk during the call of the roll or the counting of ballots, or smoke upon the floor of the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are charged with the strict enforcement of this clause.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper will see that the rule is enforced.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I move the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 50.

Mr. CAMP demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. PAGE. Is it in order to have the roll again called to see whether a quorum is present or not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman may move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, and that is the only motion now in order, the motion to adjourn having just been voted down.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I move that the House take a recess until twelve o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. During proceedings under a call of the House a motion for a recess is not in order.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in custody, in obedience to the order of the House, Mr. ACKLEN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. ACKLEN, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CAMP. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CAMP. I desire to know what penalty is imposed upon members where the House fails to excuse them?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is for the House to determine.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I rise to inquire whether the House is now proceeding under the call of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Then I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call. And I desire to say this, that the House has no right to call upon us to come here at an unreasonable hour of the night. [Laughter.] And I say further, Mr. Speaker, that the members of this House have the privilege of the eight-hour rule. We have served here to-day for eight hours already, and I think we are entitled to be discharged and to be able to obtain our needed rest. I therefore move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would suggest that it would be proper to dispose first of the case of the gentleman from Louisiana, now at the bar of the House by its order, after which the Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Then I insist on my point of order. I say it is out of order, and there is no rule which requires any man in the service of this country to come here at such an unreasonable hour of the night, unless, of course, he is in the military service of the country and his services are needed to oppose an enemy; and if we are here now to oppose an enemy, as perhaps we are, then I am ready and willing to stay here with the Speaker until morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. ACKLEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that—

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAYNE. I wish to know if it would be in order to reconsider now the vote by which the gentleman from Illinois was excused? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is within the jurisdiction of the House to determine that. The Chair hopes the gentleman from Louisiana will be permitted to proceed with his excuse.

Mr. ACKLEN. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago, while in the room of the Committee on Commerce attending to some business, Mr. Hill, one of the deputy sergeants-at-arms, notified me that my presence here was wanted, and I immediately came to the House.

Mr. EINSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope we will have order in the House. I would like to hear the excuses that gentlemen make, but we are entirely unable to do so, owing to the confusion.

Mr. ACKLEN. I say that I was engaged in business in the room of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. What kind of business?

Mr. ACKLEN. If the gentleman will permit me to proceed, I will make a proper excuse.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I have no doubt of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order to interrupt the gentleman while making his excuse.

Mr. ACKLEN. I respectfully ask to be excused on the ground that I was up in the room of the Committee on Commerce attending to business, and when notified that I was wanted here I came at once to the House.

Mr. RUSSELL, of Massachusetts. I move that the gentleman from Louisiana be excused.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes not counted.

So (no further count being demanded) the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I presume my colleague's motion is now in order, that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

A MEMBER. No quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not necessary that a quorum should be present for that purpose.

The motion to dispense with the further proceedings under the call was not agreed to.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is being executed by the House.

Mr. RICHMOND. Has the morning hour expired? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Virginia that the morning hour has not yet commenced.

Mr. KITCHIN. What is before the House now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is waiting for the execution of its order.

Mr. EINSTEIN. As I notice several members of the House in the galleries, I would like to inquire if the Sergeant-at-Arms has used due diligence in bringing members to the bar of the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is to be presumed the Sergeant-at-Arms is discharging his duty.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Suppose a member who is absent from the House without its permission succeeds in getting into the House without the knowledge of the Sergeant-at-Arms—runs the pickets, as it were—I ask if he should not be brought to the bar of the House to render an excuse for his absence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unquestionably.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I desire to state, though I do not desire to take up in any way the rôle of an informer, that our brother-member, Mr. STEELE, of North Carolina, has succeeded in evading the vigilance of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and getting on the floor of the House—

A MEMBER. It is evidently a steal. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. In contravention of the rule. I submit, in all candor, that that gentleman should be brought to the bar of the House to answer for his absence.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that he is informed the name of the gentleman from North Carolina is not on the list furnished to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am acting on information furnished to me by the gentleman from North Carolina himself. For my own part I am willing to excuse him.

Mr. RICHMOND. I move to amend the record in that particular. I was present when the honorable member from North Carolina represented to the Sergeant-at-Arms he had been absent for three hours; but the Sergeant-at-Arms, on referring to the list furnished him, said that Mr. STEELE's name was not on that list. It appears the gentleman was absent without permission of the House and I think he ought to render an excuse as well as those who were absent for a much shorter period of time.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar and said: Mr. Speaker in obedience to the order of the House I have in custody at its bar Mr. STEELE. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. STEELE, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SHELLEY. I rise to a question of order. I ask that gentlemen be seated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. Gentlemen will please be seated.

Mr. ATHERTON. I hope this proceeding will be conducted with proper gravity.

Mr. STEELE. Following the example of one of the most distinguished Representatives of the people, from the city of Brooklyn in the State of New York— [Cries of "Name!"]

Mr. STEELE. Here is the gentleman's seat, [pointing to it.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman means Mr. CHITTENDEN.

Mr. STEELE. That is exactly whom I mean; but I desire at the same time to observe the rules of parliamentary decorum and call no man's name. Following that gentleman's example and desiring this House should hear precisely what excuse I have to render to enable me to escape the very grave charge laid at my door, I shall ask the permission of the House to take my perch up at the Clerk's desk. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. You have that right, under the rule.

Mr. CONGER. Not until he purges himself of the charge upon which he now stands at the bar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan object.

Mr. CONGER. I do, unless the Chair decides the gentleman is not in contempt of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from Michigan insists on his objection the Chair would have to so decide.

Mr. CONGER. I do not insist on it. [Cries of "Take your perch!"]

Mr. STEELE, (from the Clerk's desk.) Mr. Speaker, what I shall say on this occasion—

Mr. O'NEILL. No man knows. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. Will be in the nature of what the law calls a confession and avoidance. I was absent, but the Sergeant-at-Arms in his good nature, and having made really an honest mistake, gave me permission to enter without going through the form of an arrest and an answer at the bar of the House.

And now, sir, I beg to say that

When chapman billies leave the street,
And drouthy neighbors meet,
As market days are wearin' late,
And folk begin to tak the gate;
While we sit bousing at the nappy,
And gettin' fou and unco happy—

I was not in that condition, I wish it to be distinctly understood. [Laughter.]

We think na on the lang Scots miles,
The mosses, waters, slaps, and stiles,
That lie between us and our hame,
Where sits our sulky sullen dame,
Gathering her brows like gathering storm,
Nursing her wrath to keep it warm.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I would like to inquire what the gentleman has in the tumbler which he holds up in the view of the House.

Mr. STEELE. That is what is called in your country "Adam's ale." [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"] I can give you more if you want it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. STEELE. In order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes, in order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. After prayers, is not the reading of the Journal in order? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. STEELE. Well, believing that what I shall say is quite as good as anything we shall be likely to hear on this solemn occasion, I think I will proceed. If it was original I would not have so much confidence in it. I wish everybody to understand that it is a quotation:

This truth fand honest Tam o' Shanter,
As he frae Ayr ae night did canter,
(And Ayr, wham ne'er a town surpasses
For honest men and bonny lasses.)

O Tam! hadst thou but been sae wise
As ta'en thy ain wife Kate's advice!
She tauld thee weel thou wast a skellum,
A blethering, blustering, drunken bellum;
That frae November till October,
Ae market day thou wastna sober;
That ilka melder, wi' the miller
Thou sat as lang as thou hadst siller;
That every naig was ca'd a shoe on,
The smith and thee gat roaring fou on.

Ah, gentle dames! it gars me greet
To think how many counsels sweet,
How mony lengthen'd, sage advices,
The husband frae the wife despires!

* * *
Think! ye may buy the joys owre dear—
Remember Tam o' Shanter's mare.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will now report to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move that the substance in that tumbler be analyzed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. ATHERTON. I move that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STEELE] be excused.

The motion was agreed to; upon a division—ayes 55, noes not counted.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BERRY (at eight o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 55, noes 64.

Mr. TALBOTT. I move that the House now take a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

The Sergeant-at-Arms then appeared at the bar of the House, and reported that in obedience to the order of the House he had taken in custody and now produced at the bar of the House Mr. FORSYTHE.

The SPEAKER. Mr. FORSYTHE, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to give therefor?

Mr. FORSYTHE. The only excuse I have to give is that I was very unwell, and have been since yesterday; really not able to be in the House to-day. I remained here until five o'clock, and then prevailed upon a very clever gentleman of the high-tariff persuasion to pair with me. Believing that it would be more conducive to my health and comfort to be at my own room, I left the Hall.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that my colleague [Mr. FORSYTHE] be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I have a proposition to submit which I think ought to harmonize this matter. It is that the committee to whom was referred the bill which has created all this controversy be instructed to report to this House within ten days. When the bill comes before the House it will be within the control of the majority, and can be recommitted, or any other disposition can be made of it which the majority may desire. [Cries of "Regular order!" "Regular order!"] Very well, gentlemen; I mean to be heard. You may raise your voices as much as you please, but I will be heard upon this matter. I say that we have frittered away the time of this House unnecessarily. [A voice: "Louder!"] I am not a jackass as you are. [Laughter.] I say to the Chair and this House that we are wasting time.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state his motion.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire simply to say but a word or two. We are wasting time; we have been frittering away our time upon a matter which can be settled in a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that the motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SINGLETON] is not in order. The House is now executing an order for a call of the House, and no motion is in order except such as may relate to that call, or a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I think I have no disposition whatever to take up the time of the House unnecessarily.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I rose simply to make a suggestion which I think should harmonize all feeling here. If I am not permitted to do it I will take my seat in obedience to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that when this House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Saturday next at one o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. That motion is not in order during a call of the House.

Mr. CAMP. So far as appears, there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The only way, in the opinion of the Chair, to reach such a motion would be to dispense with further proceedings under the call. According to the practice prevailing heretofore, when the House has ordered a call, the only motions admissible are such as relate to the call and a motion to adjourn, the latter motion being allowed because less than a quorum can adjourn.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in custody, in obedience to the order of the House, Mr. BICKNELL.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BICKNELL, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BICKNELL. I have not any.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I renew my motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

Mr. PAGE. That motion has just been voted down.

The SPEAKER. There has been intervening business. A member has been excused by a vote of the House.

The question having been put,

The SPEAKER said: The yeas appear to have it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, called for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 7.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. How many, sir?

The SPEAKER. Seven.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. An unfortunate number! [Laughter.]

A further count was not insisted upon; so the motion of Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, was not agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. While we are waiting for the Sergeant-at-Arms, I move that the House take fifteen minutes for repose.

The SPEAKER. The motion for the House to take "a repose" is not known to the rules. [Laughter.]

Mr. EWING. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does my colleague couple that motion with any proposition to take a vote to-morrow at any fixed hour?

Mr. EWING. I do. It would give me pleasure to have this question brought to a vote to-morrow as early as possible.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman speaks for himself alone.

Mr. EWING. I speak for myself, as the gentleman does for himself when he addresses the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it can be agreed that we shall have a vote on the pending question at a given time—

Mr. BLACKBURN. No such agreement can be had, except by unanimous consent, and that will not be given in the next twelve months.

Mr. EWING. I think the gentlemen on the other side may rely on having action to-morrow morning upon this question, with the aid of gentlemen on this side.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman repeat his statement?

Mr. EWING. I merely wish to assure my colleague that in my opinion there are many gentlemen on this side who wish to have this question (which is regarded by a very large number here as somewhat frivolous) disposed of and brushed away as quickly as possible to-morrow morning.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is the way we feel here; but what assurance can the gentleman give for his side of the House?

Mr. EWING. I can give no further assurance.

Mr. EINSTEIN. I would remind the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] that "he who dallies is a dastard, and he who doubts is damned." [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, I see before me one who deserved that damnation long ago.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 67, nays 73, not voting 152; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

The following additional pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. VALENTINE with Mr. FROST.

Mr. MCKENZIE with Mr. McLANE on all questions except motions to adjourn.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in custody, in obedience to the order of the House, Mr. AIKEN, Mr. WARNER, Mr. COBB, Mr. CANNON of Illinois, Mr. DICKEY, Mr. GEDDES, Mr. HARRIS of Virginia, Mr. MITCHELL, and Mr. WELLBORN.

The SPEAKER. Mr. AIKEN, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. AIKEN. None; but I was hungry and went home to get my dinner.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I move my colleague be excused.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move that all the gentlemen be excused. I think the hour is an unseasonable one, and the House knows it. These gentlemen for that reason ought to be excused. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion, as the Sergeant-at-Arms is at the bar with members in custody under the order of the House. He is now proceeding in receiving the excuses from the members in custody why they have absented themselves from its sitting.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I move that all the gentlemen before the House be excused. If one gentleman on motion can be excused, why may not all the gentlemen who are arraigned at the bar also be excused?

The SPEAKER. Because the rule and practice provide that gentlemen brought to the bar of the House shall each give his excuse for further action of the House.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move then to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order. Mr. WARNER, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WARNER. I have no excuse, except that I was paired on the motion to adjourn with my colleague, Mr. YOUNG, and supposing the House was about to adjourn I went to dinner.

Mr. LOWE. I move the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. COBB, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. COBB. About five o'clock this afternoon, not feeling well, I paired and went to dinner.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. WELLBORN, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WELLBORN. I have no excuse.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the gentleman be excused. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CANNON you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I do not know that I have been absent from the House without its leave. The fact is that between four and five o'clock this afternoon I paired with Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, until eight o'clock, and went to dinner. Belonging to a committee that has leave to sit during the sessions of the House, at eight o'clock I went on duty with a sub-committee of that committee, and from that time until within ten minutes ago I have been with that committee.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I move the gentleman be excused.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I move, in addition, he be allowed to print the balance of his remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. If he belongs to a committee that has the right to sit during the sessions of the House, he needs no excuse.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Nevertheless, I wish my excuse to be placed on record.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. DICKEY, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. DICKEY. I was paired about five o'clock with my colleague, Mr. NEAL, and supposing the House would soon adjourn, I went home. Further than that, I supposed to-morrow morning I would have the right to move to amend the Journal to show that I was present. [Laughter.]

Mr. ATHERTON. I move my colleague be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. GEDDES, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. GEDDES. My apology is this: I have never before been absent from my seat on a vote of this House. About six o'clock I paired with a gentleman on the other side.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move the gentleman be excused without an excuse.

Mr. GEDDES. I object. Besides, I was in ill-health, and being paired I left feeling perfectly secure, as I had voted two full days on the tariff question and was satisfied with my record and did not expect to ask any amendment of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HARRIS, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The roll was being called about five o'clock. I voted, and believing that no business would be transacted thereafter, and not feeling well, I paired with Mr. JAMES, of New York, and left the House.

Mr. HAWK. I move that the gentleman from Virginia be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MITCHELL, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MITCHELL. The only excuse I have for being here in the House instead of being at home in my room, where I desired to remain, is the fact that my landlord not knowing I was at home, gave a wrong excuse to the Sergeant-at-Arms, who made his appearance, and though I objected I was unable to resist. In obedience to his order, which I understand to be under the direction of this body, and I hope therefore that nothing serious will be done with him for it, [laughter,] I came up here. I have further to state, however, that I have been paired for several days with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RYON.] When I left I supposed the House would soon adjourn.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, having in custody, in obedience to its order, the following members: Mr. FROST, Mr. JORGENSEN, Mr. KING, and Mr. WHITEAKER.

The SPEAKER. Mr. FROST, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, upon the great principles of the democratic party— [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That point is not in order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, (to a member.) Do not pull my coat tail! [Great laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I say, sir, upon the great principles of the democratic party, of the greatest good to the greatest number, I move that all the gentlemen be excused. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that motion. The gentleman from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad now to have an opportunity at last to catch the Speaker's eye. [Laughter.] I have not been long a member of this House, but since I have been here I in common with my colleagues have entertained an ambition to catch the Speaker's eye; and therefore I wish to state that I am gratified beyond measure to have this opportunity of expressing myself and to make the acquaintance of the Speaker. [Great laughter.]

And I wish further to state that I would never have been absent from this sitting of the House had it not been in obedience to an invitation [laughter]—

A MEMBER. From whom?

Mr. FROST. In obedience to an invitation of the gentleman from Louisiana to meet the Speaker at the other end of the Avenue, I went there for the purpose of meeting the Speaker of this House, and therefore I clad myself in festal array. [Great laughter.] But arriving there, and finding the guests assembled but the host not in, for he was here doing his duty—I allude to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. KING,] and the Speaker. But—[cries of "Louder!"]—but one of the gentleman suggested that the gentleman from Kentucky—

Mr. BLACKBURN. I protest against the gentleman alluding to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. FROST. I refer, if I may be allowed to name the gentleman, to Mr. BLACKBURN, from Kentucky, who was also expected to be a member of that party, but was not present, and therefore we were obliged to wait. [Laughter.] And as soon as we found that neither the Speaker nor Mr. BLACKBURN would be there, we returned here to the House to enjoy their society. [Great laughter.] I desire now, Mr. Speaker, to express my great regret that I have been wanting in anything of respect to this House. I took care to pair with a high-tariff man before I left. [Laughter.] I hope, therefore, all things considered, that the House will excuse me.

Mr. HATCH. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to amend that motion by providing that he shall apologize for the dress in which he appears before the House to-night. [Laughter.]

The motion of Mr. HATCH was then agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. It is lucky for the gentleman from Missouri that the gentleman from Kentucky was not there.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from Kentucky is always where he belongs.

The SPEAKER. Mr. JORGENSEN, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. JORGENSEN. I am paired with Mr. GOODE, of Virginia, who is absent on account of illness; and having some friends from Virginia to entertain I hardly thought the business of the House would be interfered with on account of my absence.

Mr. HAYES. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. KING, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. KING. I had an engagement to meet some friends, and went down to make my apologies to them.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. WHITEAKER, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WHITEAKER. I am very well aware of the fact which the Speaker has stated—

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITEAKER. The House has taken my speech by title. [Laughter.]

Mr. EWING. With a view to a prompt disposition of the business of this House, I move that it do now adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 74, nays 80, not voting 138; as follows:

YEAS—74.

---	---	--	--

So the House refused to adjourn.

The Clerk announced the following pair:

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, with Mr. JAMES.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in custody, in obedience to the order of the House, the following members: Mr. WARD, Mr. GUNTER, Mr. RICHARDSON of New York, Mr. STONE, and Mr. ORTH.

The SPEAKER. Mr. WARD, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WARD. I remained here till half past six o'clock, and then, having an engagement, I paired with Mr. AIKEN, of South Carolina, and left.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I move that the gentleman be excused. The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. GUNTER, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. GUNTER. I have no excuse further than this: I remained here till half past five o'clock. I then paired with Mr. NORCROSS, of Massachusetts, and went home to get my dinner, and did not return until a few moments ago, having learned that the House was in session.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. RICHARDSON, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. RICHARDSON, of New York. I remained here till six o'clock. On the motion to adjourn, on which the yeas and nays were being taken at that time, I voted to adjourn, and, supposing that others would do the same, I left before the vote was declared.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the gentleman be excused.

Mr. CONGER. I hope not, if the gentleman voted to adjourn and left.

The motion of Mr. BERRY was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. STONE, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. STONE. The only excuse I have is that I have a sick child, and about six o'clock paired with General COOK, supposing the House would adjourn soon.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I ask that I be excused from further attendance at the sitting of the House this evening.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ORTH, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ORTH. I am paired with General JOHNSTON, and went to dinner.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. The call of the roll on the last vote having developed the fact that there is a quorum present, I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. SPARKS. And I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is one of higher privilege.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. SPARKS; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I desire to inquire whether by the action of this House the morning hour has been dispensed with? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair can answer that question in the negative. Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I now call for the regular order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. And I call for the regular order, which is the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Delaware, that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONGER. While there are members present in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms it is proper that they should be allowed to give their excuses.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will receive the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared and stated that in obedience to the order of the House he had taken into custody Mr. GOODE, of Virginia, whom he now produced at the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER. Mr. GOODE, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. GOODE. I attended the session of the House all day to-day until six o'clock. At that hour, not feeling very well, I paired with my colleague, Mr. JORGENSEN, and went to my room. The only apology I have to make to the House for not returning earlier is that I believed the issue between the two sides had been sufficiently intensified by the wrangle which we had had for two days on points of order; and I thought there was good sense enough on both sides of the House to avoid a night session like this.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I move that the gentleman be excused. The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. MARTIN] that all further proceedings under the call of the House be dispensed with. On that motion the gentleman calls for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there was 1 in the affirmative.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. I will not call for any further count. [Laughter.]

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. TALBOTT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the execution of the call of the House which has been ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON (at ten o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

The question was taken by a viva voce vote; and before the result was declared,

Mr. STEVENSON called for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon ordering the yeas and nays; and there were 34 in the affirmative.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 72, nays 80, not voting 140; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in custody the following members, in obedience to the order of the House: Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia, Mr. HOUK, and Mr. DAGGETT.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HAMMOND, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I attended the sitting of the House from the beginning of the session this morning until six o'clock. I then went home. I have been unwell for a week, and am so now.

Mr. GOODE. I move the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. If it be in order, I ask to be excused for the remainder of the evening.

There being no objection, leave of absence was granted to Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia, for the remainder of the evening.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HOUK, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Speaker, I came here this morning as I have been in the habit of doing. I believe this is the first time I have missed a roll-call when in the city. I remained in this Hall until half after six o'clock. I voted for adjournment. I had no idea in the world that the House would be so stubborn as to vote contrary to the way I did; but, as a matter of precaution, I paired with my colleague, Mr. TAYLOR. I went to my quarters and went to bed, not feeling very well. While there I overheard some gentleman making the impertinent inquiry whether I was in or not. My landlord replied that I was not, that I had not come to dinner and he did not know where I was. But I felt great anxiety in regard to the proceedings of this House; and although the turnout which had been engaged to convey me to this place had left, I rose, put on my attire, saw a street car, but was not willing to wait for it, started, beat it, and am here.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. DAGGETT, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. DAGGETT. I do not know that I have any excuse worth mentioning except the weakness of having reposed too much confidence in the opinion of older members, who gave me their assurance that there would be no night session. I paired with the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.]

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. LAPHAM is paired with him.

Mr. DAGGETT. I paired with him; and he is a stalwart democrat, who I believe never voted a republican ticket, who lives in a State where school-houses are seventy-seven miles apart. [Laughter.] I thought I was doing the republican party some service in taking him temporarily from the floor.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were—yeas 51, noes 57.

Mr. TAYLOR called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 72, nays 76, not voting 144; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

The following additional pair was announced from the Clerk's desk: Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. REED.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar, having in custody, in obedience to the order of the House, Mr. DEUSTER, Mr. WISE, Mr. TUCKER, Mr. BROWNE, Mr. ROBESON, Mr. CARLISLE, Mr. MILLS, Mr. CALKINS, Mr. WILLIAMS of Wisconsin, Mr. HOOKER, and Mr. HEILMAN.

The SPEAKER. Mr. WISE, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WISE. My apology to the House is this: About noon I had two gentlemen from my district visiting me. I made an agreement to meet them at my room at nine o'clock.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move the gentleman be excused.

Mr. WISE. The House has not yet heard my excuse. I discharged my duty to my friends from Somerset County, and then returned to the House.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. WISE was excused.

The SPEAKER. Mr. DEUSTER, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave; what excuse have you to offer?

Mr. SPRINGER. I move the gentleman from Wisconsin be allowed to speak in his native tongue. [Laughter.]

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt I could offer a better excuse in my native tongue than I could do now. After I witnessed the minority of this House enacting the celebrated comedy of Shakespeare's "Love's Labor Lost" during the whole afternoon, I felt so drowsy I left and wanted to see my wife. [Great laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I move my colleague be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. TUCKER, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BLACKBURN. As the gentleman from Wisconsin was allowed to employ his own native dialect, and as the gentleman from Virginia has no tongue of his own, I move he be allowed to be heard by counsel. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

Mr. RICHMOND. I move my colleague be allowed to print his remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. TUCKER. I am obliged to the gentleman from Kentucky and my colleague; but I have a native tongue though it is not as available as that of the gentleman from Kentucky. [Laughter.] After the spirit of '76, of which I have partaken to-day, I yield to my friend from New Jersey to make my excuse. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. I move the gentleman be excused.

The House divided; and there were ayes 66, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ROBESON, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. ROBESON. The only excuse I have, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the House, is that before I left I was paired with the distinguished gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] and, as he was excused by a vote of the House, I had an idea (a very foolish one to be sure) that he being excused by the House, possibly I might be put upon the same level, under the idea that things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

If that is not sufficient I still have an excuse, and it is this: Before I left a motion was made to adjourn, and I thought that having wasted all day in enacting what my friend has called the great comedy of Shakspeare, "Much Ado about Nothing," the good sense of the House would lead them to adjourn; and I so expressed myself to a gentleman who asked, "Are you going away?" I said "Yes; I have great confidence in the good sense of the House of Representatives." "Yes," said my friend, "but the gentleman from the seventh district of Kentucky has the floor, and you cannot rely upon his good sense." [Laughter.] Being new here and not having the experience of older members with regard to the characteristics of the gentleman from the seventh district of Kentucky and those who follow him, I left in perfect confidence, relying on the good sense of this House that they would no longer follow him in his wild-goose chase.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And he got the goose. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBESON. No; I was deceived, [laughter;] I thought the gentleman would exhibit that good sense for which he ought to be remarkable, [laughter,] but I find his folly is as strong as the spirit of his own State and as deep as its own waving blue-grass. [Laughter.]

In real excuse, I beg to say I went from this House, paired, when I supposed it ought to have adjourned, and the very moment I received official notice—and I speak for myself and all those who were with me—at the very moment we received official notice that the House desired our presence, we came at once, and came to stay. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLYMER. I move the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BROWNE, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BROWNE. I secured a pair with some gentleman whose name I am not able to mention [laughter] for the purpose of accepting an invitation to dine with the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] and I preferred to dine at his table to sitting here in the House. That is the fact about it.

Mr. BAYNE. I move the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CARLISLE, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CARLISLE. Mr. Speaker, I remained in the House from twelve o'clock until some time after six, voting on every roll-call. Then I left to get my dinner. After dinner I made some inquiry, and as the Journal had not yet been read, I presumed I would be able to get here in time for that.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I move the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MILLS, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MILLS. We read in the Book of our holy religion that Christ dined with publicans and sinners. In humble imitation of His example I went to-day to dine with a republican and a sinner [laughter] in the hope while I was dining with him that I would get him to amend his record. I dined with my distinguished friend, Mr. ROBESON, but I am not able to say whether I have succeeded in getting him to amend his record or not.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I move the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. CALKINS, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I move the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. WILLIAMS, you have absented yourself from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I had the toothache. Judge GEDDES very kindly paired with me, and I went straight to the dentist's and got my tooth filled. Then I went home and got my dinner, and afterward went across the street with my wife to make a call, and returned to the House when informed that the Sergeant-at-Arms desired my presence here. I, like a man, wanted to hide and not come; but my wife said that I ought to come, and I came, like a fool, and found myself under arrest. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Speaker, between the Sergeant-at-Arms and the toothache and the tariff I do not know what will become of me; and if it were not for the great regard I have for the Speaker, for the rules of this House, and for parliamentary law I should not care. I am willing, however, under all the circumstances, to drop this matter if the House will grant me leave of absence. [Laughter.]

Mr. POUND. I move the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HOOKER, you have absented yourself from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HOOKER. I beg to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have this excuse: I have been trying for two days to get the floor. I have been trying for two days to catch the angle of the Speaker's eye. I have been fishing for it for a couple of weeks without being able to reach it. I think both the Speaker and the Sergeant-at-Arms have made a mistake, so far as I am concerned, for I have been here and have been answering to my name all the evening.

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms enumerated the gentleman among the members brought in under arrest.

Mr. HOOKER. I beg to say that the Sergeant-at-Arms, like the Speaker, made a mistake.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that it was not his mistake. The gentleman from Mississippi will be discharged.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HEILMAN, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HEILMAN. Da Wir nichts thaten ging Ich und kaufte mir Eisenbahn Billette um nach Haus zu gehen auf zehn Tage Urlaub. [Great laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's excuse seems to be a good one. [Laughter.]

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. I move that the gentleman be excused. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that he has received a letter by the hands of the Sergeant-at-Arms from the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BRIGHT, who is detained at home by sickness and asks that the House will grant him leave of absence to-night.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that leave of absence be granted to the gentleman.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also desires to state that the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. SMITH, who has been ill in bed for a week past, and who is only just able to leave his room, asks to be excused for to-night.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is requested also to ask that the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HAWK, be excused for to-night for the reason that he had to leave the House in time to take the last car to reach his home. It is well known to the House that the gentleman has lost a limb, and I hope there will be no objection to excusing him.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SPARKS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ROBESON. We have been brought here and have come to stay.

The SPEAKER. The Chair also has a letter from Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, in which he states that he is at home suffering from a violent cold and from neuralgia. He asks to be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLLS. It occurs to me this prolonged session of the House is resulting in no good. I therefore move to adjourn.

Mr. SPARKS. I made that motion.

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] addressed the Chair the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NICHOLLS] to make that motion.

Mr. NICHOLLS. When we come back to-morrow morning we can settle this question; and if the House will now adjourn I for one promise not to engage to-morrow in anything like filibustering or anything that will delay the business of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes a statement that if the House shall now adjourn he, the member speaking, will come here to-morrow to resist all dilatory motions.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion to adjourn.

Mr. ROBESON. Is it in order to move that that motion lie on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 79, nays 76, not voting 137; as follows:

During the call of the roll,

Mr. HOOKER (who had voted "no") said: I am so earnestly appealed to by the recalcitrant members of the House, Mr. BLACKBURN of Kentucky, Mr. WARNER of Ohio, and Mr. SPRINGER of Illinois, and having been here during this prolonged sitting, and not having missed a vote, that in obedience to their wish I change my vote now from "no" to "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded; and accordingly (at twelve o'clock and fifteen minutes a. m., Thursday, March 25) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows, viz:

By the SPEAKER: Memorial of William Harvey, claiming to have been the first to discover the power of steam, and asking an appropriation by Congress to support him in his old age—to the Committee on Manufactures.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 25, 1880.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To-morrow being Good Friday, I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. There is a great deal of work before the Senate.

Mr. WHYTE. But to-morrow is Good Friday.

Mr. KERNAN. Allow me to make a suggestion. We adjourned over a day to commemorate a good man of our own country. Now let us adjourn over the day on which the Christian world commemorates the death of the Saviour of mankind. That is my reason for favoring the motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I make no opposition to the motion. The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, presenting the importance of geographical and topographical surveys of the territory of the United States west of the Mississippi River, together with an estimate of an appropriation of $75,000 to defray the expenses of such surveys for the year 1880-'81; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the enactment of a law to protect the fishing interests in fresh-water lakes and their tributaries; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, relating to the improvement of the Wisconsin and Fox Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN. I present a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, addressed to myself, relative to the condition of the funds due to the Sioux Indians of Minnesota prior to and at the time of the Sioux outbreak in that State. The communications contain information in regard to a bill now before the Committee on Claims. I move that the papers be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of the Virginia State Agricultural Society, praying that the importance of the agricultural interest may receive recognition by Congress, and that the Commissioner of Agriculture be given a place in the Cabinet; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, presented a petition, signed by 187 ex-soldiers and citizens of Maine, praying for the passage of a law to pay soldiers the difference between the value of greenbacks and gold at the time of their payment; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition of citizens of Caledonia County, Vermont, praying such an amendment of the patent laws as will protect innocent users of patented articles from prosecution as infringers; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Town, postmaster of the city of Ripon, in the county of Fond du Lac, in the State of Wisconsin, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 496) providing for the examination and adjudication of pension claims, reported it with amendments.

REPORT ON FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate for printing the reports of the United States Fish Commission, have instructed me to report back the same, and recommend concurrence in the amendments of the House. I ask for present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives, which were, in lines 4 and 5 of the resolution, to strike out "1,000" and insert "700," and in lines 5 and 6 to strike out "1,500" and insert "1,800;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring), That 3,000 sets of the five volumes of the reports of the United States Fish Commission be printed from the stereotype plates, of which 700 shall be for the use of the Senate, 1,800 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 for the use of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries.

Mr. PADDOCK. I understand that the amendments of the House of Representatives do not reduce the number of reports to be printed, but only change the apportionment.

Mr. WHYTE. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that the change is only in the distribution between the Senate and the House of Representatives.

The amendments were concurred in.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 97) providing for a commission to consider and report what legislation is needed for the better regulation of commerce among the States; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length at the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read at length.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That a commission is hereby constituted, to consist of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker, and three commissioners, to be appointed by the President, who shall sit during the recess, and inquire generally into the conditions that will most favorably affect the transportation of the commerce among the States carried by land and water routes, securing thereby to the people the required facilities at the lowest charges with the greatest certainty and economy in time, and that will avoid and prevent any unjust discrimination, unnecessary burdens or impediments in its transportation, in order to ascertain whether these conditions can be secured by legislation by Congress, and, if so, in what particulars and by what measures, and report their recommendations to Congress at its next session; that said commission shall have power to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and examine witnesses; shall have power to appoint and employ one clerk and two stenographers, to be paid such usual compensation as shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and each commissioner appointed by the President shall receive a compensation of — dollars per diem while engaged in the performance of his duties, and his actual reasonable expenses; and the sum necessary therefor is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, late in the last Congress I introduced a joint resolution of a like character with this, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, but owing to the want of time no action was taken upon it. The one which I now offer differs from the other in two respects: First, in extending the scope of the investigation by the commission; and, secondly, in the number constituting the commission and the method of their appointment.

The relation of the National Government to the interstate and internal commerce of this country is attracting a large share of the public attention. From the peculiarity of our dual form of government and the division of power between Congress and the States practical difficulties have arisen and will come to the surface in the control and management of many interests. Interests which for a time are local and clearly within the province of State management in time assume such proportions and affect the general interests of the country so thoroughly that they in fact lose the characteristic of local and become of national interest.

This is true of our internal commerce and of its transportation. For many years such commerce was confined mainly to the States in which it had origin, but the internal commerce of this nation has increased to such enormous proportions, estimated in value at over $53,000,000,000 annually, and in its transportation it is carried through so many States, that all characteristics of locality are lost, and what is purely State or local commerce is fast losing its proportion to that of the interstate commerce. A very small proportion of the products of the soil, of the forest, of the mines, of manufactures is consumed in the States that produce them. The grains, meats, tobacco, &c., of the great West go eastward and to foreign countries for consumption. The cotton, rice, tobacco, and sugar from the South supply largely the world's demand for these productions. The lumber of the West and South is carried to all parts of the country. The anthracite and bituminous coals of Pennsylvania are consumed all the way West and beyond Omaha, and they go to the South and East, and are finding their way to foreign countries. The iron ores of Michigan, of Missouri, of Virginia and New York find customers in other States. The iron and steel of Pennsylvania is used in all parts of the country. The manufactures of the East, of the South, of the Middle States, and of the West are interchanged throughout all parts of the country. So that this internal commerce must be looked upon as national. It deserves and properly demands that its interest shall be thoroughly understood and properly encouraged and protected by the National Government.

The laws regarding commerce that now exist on your statute-books are of necessity the product of growth; they must be adapted from time to time to the changing condition, wants, and necessities of such commerce. Congress at an early date in our history as a Government, when conveyance by water was the principal means by which the then existing commerce could be transported, legislated to meet the wants of the people, at that time scattered as they were along our sea-coast, on the banks of the rivers of our eastern coast, and to some extent on the great rivers of the West, and on the northern lakes, and we have laws regulating the coastwise and lake service, protecting navigation on our rivers, and large outlays of money have been made by every Congress to improve the harbors and secure to the people the use of the rivers by removing impediments to and obstacles in the way of their safe navigation.

Further than this, Congress at an early date recognized its duty to the people in building a great thoroughfare in the national road to furnish facilities to the people for the transportation of their productions between the East and the then West, and to open access to the cheap lands beyond the Alleghenies. The extension of this system of roads was stopped by the introduction of the railroad.

It is acknowledged to be one of the first duties of all governments to provide such ways both by land and water and to regulate their use. When the power to improve water-courses, to build canals and railways, is delegated by the Government to another party, that party becomes in fact but the agent of the Government in the performance of a high duty, and for such purposes the sovereign power of eminent domain is given to them. The situation in this country is peculiar. It was but natural that the framers of our Constitution should have recognized the duty of the Government they were about to establish in this respect, and therefore they fully provided in that instrument all the powers necessary for Congress to absolutely control—and this in entire independence of the States—the coastwise and lake service and the navigation of the rivers, because they were the natural ways, and the only ways at that time that were thought practicable for the transportation of the commerce of the nation, both internal and foreign. The possibilities of the canal and the railway were at that time unknown.

But the fortunate use by the framers of our national Constitution of the broad and general language in which they conferred upon Congress power to regulate commerce among the States—a power which when it exercises becomes by that fact exclusive—has brought within its scope not only the instrumentalities of commercial intercourse then known, but all which the necessities and genius of the race should for all time to come invent and develop; and thus the railway and the canal, as highways of interstate intercourse, have come to be as legitimately within the commercial power of the National Government as the rivers, the lakes, and the seas.

But, as you are aware, the system of transportation by canal and railway came into use at a later date. Congress could not comprehend their possibilities or influence over the traffic of the country, nor how rapidly the railway would develop its usefulness. The building of railways and canals was thus left to the States. The gradually opening West with the promise of its fertility and the inducements to emigrants to settle there produced the canals between the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland which led those States to construct, or aid in the construction of, the canals to connect their chief cities on the Atlantic coast with the western lakes and rivers, that the promised prize of trade with the West that was to be might be secured to such cities.

When the railway was first introduced into this country, about a half a century ago, its profitable use was thought to be limited to the largest centers of population and traffic. The ability of the railway to attract population and create traffic and wealth in a new and partially developed country was not understood; nor was their future ability to successfully compete in cost of transportation with the sea-coast or lake service or transportation by river or canal thought to be in the range of the possible. The railway was regarded as the luxury of a settled country, and it was many years before their beneficial influence on new countries was understood. Such being the case, they could not be considered as of national interest, any more than any great local improvement is a benefit to the whole country. It was then but natural that the railway should become the subject of State legislation and State control. The railways for many years were thus local in their influence and operations, and no one could foresee how near the future was when they would more thoroughly bind the country together than the rivers or the lakes or the extended sea-coast; nor how thoroughly dependent the nation would be on their use for its development, for the happiness, the prosperity of the people, for the transportation of their surplus productions, for the articles of their consumption, for their comforts, their necessities, and for their luxuries.

The Senate will thus note the anomaly presented: that while to Congress is assigned the exclusive control of the transportation of the commerce of the nation by the sea-coast, by lake, by river, and its duty to provide all necessary safeguards to protect and facilitate the movement of such commerce, on the basis of a national duty, which in principle should cover all means by which such commerce is transported, yet to the States was left the necessity of providing and controlling the canal and the railway, the latter of which, the railway, has become the controlling avenue on which the people of this country mainly depend for the transportation of their persons and property—a responsibility which the General Government should have assumed in place of the States, if the framers of the Constitution could have looked but a little more than three-quarters of a century into the future.

The rapid growth and development of the railway system in this country is familiar to every Senator. I need not trouble you with the statistics showing the number of miles of railway now built, the tonnage carried, the character and value of this tonnage, the number of persons carried, the capital cost represented by the railways built, the decreased charges and cost of transportation due to increased facilities, increased traffic, enlarged experience, &c., nor detail the miles of railway built in the different States and their peculiar traffic, nor attempt to describe the different lines or combinations of roads which reach and extend themselves all over the country. But I would rather call your attention to this subject more generally. The railways of this country are rapidly losing all traces of their local character by connections. The railways of every State reach the borders of adjoining States, where they again come into connection with the systems of those States, and thus the railways of all the States in this country become connected and form in place of separate State systems a grand national system.

This great national system is being rapidly extended to every center of population, is being pushed through every part of our wide domain, thereby uniting the North and the South, and the eastern coast with the western. By this power of penetration the railway becomes infinitely more valuable to the nation than the long sea-coast, either on the Atlantic or the Pacific, or the great rivers and lakes.

To those who have watched the growth and development of the railways in this country, it is not strange that the larger corporations have absorbed other roads within their States, nor that they have acquired control of, or influence over, railways in other States. As there are great commercial centers in this country, the connection of these centers by lines of railway, under one influence, was the natural result. Such control, when wisely exercised, has been for the public benefit. It has enabled the influential corporations in such lines to improve the condition and increase the facilities of roads that would otherwise have been unable to make improvements in their physical and financial condition, or furnish such facilities as were needed by the people. It has given homogeneity to the management, and the result has been less cost for management, greater ability to perform the highest service, and greatly lessened the cost of transportation, and, as a consequence, the rates charged the public for the services performed have been very much decreased.

It has been largely due to such facilities thus acquired by such control and influence that the population of the great West has been so rapidly increased; that Territories have been made into States, and that the surplus productions of the West have been carried to the great markets at prices which paid the producer, encouraged the building up of the new States in population, and thereby created wealth, and which has added so largely to the development and wealth of the nation. It has been through the railways, and largely due to this formation of great lines of railways extending from the Atlantic seaports to the western centers of trade, that our country was enabled during the last three years to export its immense surplus productions and by low prices take the markets of the Old World.

Who can properly measure the influence such great combined lines of railway have had in enabling the people of this country to reduce their indebtedness at home and in foreign countries; to encourage the employment of labor in all its various branches? Of what immense advantage have these lines of railway been to the General Government in enabling it to carry out successfully the plan of redemption of specie payments and in paying off and refunding its indebtedness at a lower rate of interest. In all the elements of our present prosperity the force of the influence of these great combined railway lines has been a most important factor. I have no hesitation in asserting broadly that the present status of the country, its credit, its financial position, and its prosperity has been largely due to the facilities secured to the country by the great combined lines of railway between the East and the producers of the West, South, and Southwest. And further, I have but noted the influence of the railways now built. If they have had such marked influence on the prosperity of the country in the past, what must be the influence in the future of lines yet to be constructed?

It is true there are now over eighty thousand miles of railway in this country; but to furnish the facilities the country will require for its further development this number should be duplicated. Every year must increase the number of miles, and thus every year the problem of the relation of their management to the interests of the country becomes more intricate and more difficult of solution.

It is not strange that when the railway systems of the States suddenly, as it were, found that by their union with the systems of adjoining States they became an integral part of the system of the whole country, the advantages of such combination and formation of great lines become patent; nor is it strange that large and often increasing outlays of money were made for the purpose of constructing connecting and branch roads thought to be necessary to complete the influence of such lines; nor is it strange that when these lines between the east and western centers were perfected that rivalries should have arisen between them. There had been a sudden awakening to a knowledge of their power and their possibilities, and before the representatives of the lines could fully understand their new position, or appreciate their responsibilities they were involved in a serious contest, which continued for some years, for traffic at prices irrespective of any proper governing principle. Such a contest between such powers—for powers they were—was, of course, demoralizing to trade and destructive of values in all railway property.

To put a stop to a course thus destructive, one that was doing the country no good and that was rapidly affecting the credit of the railway companies, as well as doing great injury to the great numbers of people of all grades and conditions in society who had invested in the shares and securities of these companies, the hard earnings which constituted their dependence for their comforts and living—I say that, to put a stop to such destructive rivalry, many of these companies agreed with each other that war should cease, that they would fix reasonable rates and provide for such a division of the traffic between them as the laws of business would indicate to be their proper proportion. Such agreements are now in operation in different parts of the States.

The demoralization of rates alluded to naturally affected all business unfavorably. The people felt there was something wrong and that injustice was done them. On the other hand they feared that through the agreements between the roads they would be charged unfair prices, and that the healthful benefits of competition would be denied them. From the unfortunate condition of war between the roads and from their recent agreements have arisen many grave charges against the management of railways. Appeals to rectify the evils, as charged, have been made to State Legislatures, and Congress has been asked to interfere for the protection of the interests of the people.

It is believed that the power of railway managers to disturb the proper currents of business and importance of localities, by their ability to fix their own rates, should be curtailed or placed within proper limits, and in this belief I fully concur. Charges have been made that the railway companies have discriminated against the interests of the citizens of the States from which their charters have been obtained, in favor of the citizens of other States, and counter-charges, or protests, have been made from the other side that States have, or should have, no right to interfere with the natural workings of transportation, by imposing regulations of any kind that would prevent the people of other States receiving the advantages of their position as centers of traffic and of competition, and that, so far, it is against the constitutional principle of free trade between the States and across the States.

Charges have been made that the railway companies have given preference by various means to certain shippers in rates, facilities, &c. Charges have been made that the tendency to consolidate railway companies and the formation of great lines under one influence is dangerous to the interests of the people. Many fear that in the near future the great majority of the lines of railway in this country will be under the control of speculators whose only interest will be the immediate profit they may realize. It is strongly urged that owing to the defective laws in many of the States the rights of share and loan holders are not properly protected, that railways no longer furnish a safe medium for investors, and that the tendency of the management of the whole system, as it now has existence under State governments, is not for the interests of the people of the country; that from the uncertainty that prevails this will be more so in the future as to the safety of investments in railway companies; that the facilities required by the country for its development will not be provided; that the rates for transportation of persons and property will be much higher than they would be under proper regulations.

I might have named many of these charges that have been freely made and strongly believed in that the country is not receiving and will not in the future receive all the benefits it is fairly entitled to from the present management of the railway system by the States. I do not propose to express any opinion about the justice of any of these statements or charges. But there is enough in them to warrant the Congress of the United States in having the whole subject thoroughly examined.

But as connected with the evils of railway management much of it is affected by the transportation by sea, by canal, by lake, and by river. They are an essential element in the rivalry and in fixing prices, so that no examination can be complete or satisfactory unless it embraces the whole question of the transportation of the internal or interstate commerce of the nation.

Bearing in mind all these considerations I have suggested, the importance of an early investigation into the whole subject is evident. If any legislation be had it is important that such laws should be put into operation as soon as practicable. I need not say more to impress on the minds of Senators the importance of the railway system and other transportation of this country, nor the wisdom of their taking, at this time, into serious consideration the relation which all the great avenues by which all the internal commerce of this country is carried, bear to the public interests, in order that the Senate may ascertain what, if any, legislation is required to secure to the people of the country the greatest possible benefits in the use of these avenues of transportation.

I have endeavored to trace the growth of these systems of transportation, more particularly of the railways, the steps by which it emerged from being dependent upon local support to carrying the bulk of the products of the nation; the difficulties that naturally grew out of this new status which it now occupies; the attempted cure for any evils that arose from the rivalries of the main lines by an agreement among the lines. I have enumerated the major part of the charges that have been made against the management of the railways in their relation to the public.

You have thus before you a condensed statement of a very important question. The problem to solve is a very difficult one. It will not do, as has been attempted, to legislate on one or more grievances. The question must be treated broadly, with a full understanding of all the facts in the case.

A commission as proposed in the resolution will have before them the anomalous fact of the Congress of the United States controlling the navigation of the sea-coast, of the rivers, of the railways in the Territories and the unoccupied public lands, and of the lakes; and the States the railways and the canals within the States; the great internal commerce of the country being thus subject to the control of Congress on the one hand and of thirty-eight States on the other. They will have to examine what relation these highways of transportation should sustain to the General Government to produce the best results to the country at large, and whether, under our mixed form of government, such proper relation is practicable by legislation.

They will have to examine into the operations of the whole subject of the transportation of the internal commerce of the nation by the present avenues, and ascertain what evils exist, what unnecessary burdens are placed on such commerce, and what legislation will cure such evils and relieve the people of such burdens. It will be for them to take into consideration what legislation, if any, will harmonize the interests of the States and those of the General Government in the railways and canals; what legislation, if any, will give greater confidence to capitalists in their securities, will more fully protect the rights of shareholders in their property, and of the people in the use of the railways and canals, lakes, rivers, and sea-coast service.

It is not a question for present discussion what laws should be passed, but rather to obtain the facts and secure a report from a competent commission charged with an examination of these important questions, which will cover in what particulars and by what measures, if any, such result as contemplated in the resolution can be secured, and their recommendations in the premises.

As I said before, these questions are discussed by the people, the press, and the Legislatures, and it is proper that if by legislation good can be accomplished, Congress should have the benefit of the recommendations of a commission consisting, as provided in the resolution, of three Senators, three members of the House of Representatives, and three gentlemen appointed from the mass of the people, appointed by the President, who would bring the benefit of large practical experience and observation on these questions.

If such a commission are unable to devise legislation that would work for good the country should know it, and then the people and the Legislatures of the States will then endeavor to devise means to reach a solution as fair as may be.

I cannot say that I have much expectation of any favorable solution; and I say this with some practical knowledge of the difficulties in the way. And, further, I am satisfied no one has yet given sufficient attention to the whole question to enable them to devise a comprehensive answer to the questions involved in the resolution. The commission is, therefore, the first step in any practical result, and therefore this resolution is submitted to your favorable judgment.

I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF INDIAN TREATIES.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, submitted the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to distribute, from the number now in his possession, one copy of the revised Indian Treaties to each State and territorial library, and one copy to each designated depository of public documents in the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I do not ask for present action.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I doubt very much whether that can be done by a concurrent resolution. The law places the copies in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior and directs a particular mode of distribution. I doubt whether the Senate and House together can authorize him, unless by law, to do what is proposed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. My attention was called to the matter in this way: I applied to the Secretary of the Interior for a copy of the volume containing the Indian treaties, for the purpose of sending it to the State library of my State. He called my attention to the statute, which in his opinion did not authorize him to furnish such a copy. He had the resolution which I have offered prepared, and sent it to me with a communication. The resolution can lie over and I will call it up at the next meeting of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table, subject to the call of the Senator from Wisconsin.

ASSISTANT SENATE LIBRARIAN.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate yesterday passed the resolution authorizing the appointment of an assistant librarian for the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That motion will be entered.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Was not the resolution passed upon a call of the yeas and nays?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir. The motion is in order or I should not have made it. I called for the yeas and nays and they were taken upon the engrossment and third reading of the resolution, but not upon the passage of it. We all voted for the passage of the resolution so far as the record is concerned.

THOMAS LUCAS.

Mr. INGALLS. During my absence from the Senate a few days ago, on the call of the Calendar a bill (S. No. 152) for the relief of Thomas Lucas was passed over on the objection of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] as I was not present to explain it. I suppose under the custom of the Senate a bill ought not to lose its place on the Calendar, and if it does, I will ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up now. The reason I do so is that the beneficiary of the bill is exposed to great hardship in consequence of the failure of the Senate to act. The bill is very brief, can be readily explained, and I am quite sure the Senate will be glad to pass it if they hear the explanation.

Mr. MORRILL. Let it go on the Calendar as the first bill for Monday morning.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Vermont suggests that the bill take its place on the Calendar as the first bill on Monday morning, under the Anthony rule. If that will be agreeable I shall assent to the suggestion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas that the bill stand first on the call of the Calendar Monday morning next?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill was passed over during my absence on the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, as I was not present to explain it.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Missouri will lose no right to make an objection after the Senator from Kansas explains the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I merely ask that it may take its place on the Calendar, to be called on Monday morning under the Anthony rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be reported.

Mr. BLAINE. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that he will not lose his right to object then. An objection will be in order after an explanation of the bill is given.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand that; but I want to know what the bill is.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. No. 152) for the relief of Thomas Lucas.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not object to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is granted.

JESSE F. PHARES.

Mr. HEREFORD. I have a similar request to make. During my necessary absence from the Senate a few days ago, a bill (S. No. 1185) granting a pension to Jesse F. Phares was passed over. I ask that the same order be made in that as in the preceding case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears none and the bill will stand No. 2 on the Calendar, to be called Monday morning.

INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION OF 1883.

Mr. KERNAN. I hope that the bill (S. No. 1160) to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the treaty of peace and the recognition of American Independence by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and the products of the soil and mine, in the city of New York, in the State of New York, in the year 1883, will be reached on the next regular call of the Calendar. I wish to give notice to Senators that if the bill is not reached before Tuesday next I shall ask that it be taken up at that time and considered. A great many people are anxious that the bill should be disposed of. I call attention to it now in order that I may have an opportunity to move to take the bill up not later than Tuesday next during the morning hour, or immediately after the morning hour, and have it considered.

UTE INDIANS IN COLORADO.

Mr. COKE. I gave notice a few days ago that I should call up this morning the bill (S. No. 1509) to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same. I find, however, that it is impracticable to get the bill acted on to-day. I rise now to give notice that on Monday morning, after the morning hour, I shall ask that all pending orders be laid aside in order that that bill may be considered. The bill is a very important one. It involves the agreement recently made between the executive department of the Government and the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado. The chiefs and head-men of the Ute Indians are now here waiting for the action of Congress. In view of the importance of the bill I shall appeal to the Senate on Monday morning to take it up and proceed with its consideration.

Mr. TELLER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 1509) to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado, for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

LAND PATENTS OF INSANE CLAIMANTS.

Mr. PADDOCK. The bill (S. No. 1404) to provide for issuing patents for public lands claimed under the pre-emption and homestead laws in cases where the claimants have become insane ought to be passed immediately. I understand that there is a case in Minnesota where, if relief is not given, the time will soon expire within which the person can make his proofs. It will not take two minutes to pass the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill be read at length.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask for the Calendar. We have a large number of cases upon the Calendar reported from the various committees, and it is infinitely better for the orderly discharge and disposition of business that we should proceed with the Calendar. We have adopted a rule to consider the Calendar, and I hope the Senate will go on with the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar will be proceeded with in order.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator from Missouri will withdraw his objection under the circumstances. It is important that the bill should pass—

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me say one word to the Senator; it will save time. I am the kindest-hearted man in the world, I think, but it is utterly useless to make appeals to me when the committee of which I am chairman is behind me demanding that its bills and other bills shall be considered. Now, give us all an equal chance. The bills have been reported; they are upon the Calendar; let us dispose of them in an orderly and methodical way. I cannot withdraw my objection.

NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 1282) to incorporate the National Educational Association, which has been considered for several sittings. The pending question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time? upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BLAINE rose.

Mr. TELLER. If this bill can be voted on shortly I shall not object to its consideration, but otherwise I am going to object to it.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I will not say a word.

Mr. TELLER. If anybody wants to say anything, I shall not object at present.

Mr. BLAINE. I will say only a very few words, especially as I do not see the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] in his seat. When this bill was up yesterday that Senator made some remarks which struck me as being of a character that ought not to go at least without answer, if not contradiction. One particular declaration arrested my attention at the time. The honorable Senator, who is known throughout the country as an able lawyer, and therefore his words are taken as having weight on any question of law or Constitution, made the declaration:

No matter how important the subject of education may be, it is not a subject committed to this Government, and unless committed by express words or by reasonable implication we have no control over it, we have no right to further it, to hinder it, or to do anything whatever in regard to it.

Further he said:

If this read "for the purpose of collecting and diffusing information in regard to education in the District of Columbia," no matter what might be said in regard to other provisions of the bill, it would be clearly within our power, so far as that is a subject of legislation.

He objected to diffusing information in regard to education beyond the District of Columbia, and the Senator, with an air of absolute conclusiveness, pronounced it to be wholly beyond the constitutional power of Congress to do it. I stated at the time that some of the notable framers of the Constitution of the Union did not take the same view as the honorable Senator from Wisconsin. Twice in General Washington's annual messages to Congress he recommended a national university. He said:

Among the motives to such an institution, the assimilation of the principles, opinions, and manners of our countrymen, by the common education of a portion of our youth from every quarter, well deserves attention. The more homogeneous our citizens can be made in these particulars, the greater will be our prospect of permanent union; and a primary object of such a national institution should be the education of our youth in the science of government.

He goes on and gives a great many reasons for it; and yet the honorable Senator from Wisconsin makes the declaration I read just now, in the very face of the fact that Congress for the last thirty years has been largely aiding in maintaining an institution which does not stop even at diffusing knowledge among the citizens of the United States; which does not stop at the District of Columbia, where he says we are wholly stopped; it does not even stop at all the Territories of the Union, including the States thereof, but its object is the "diffusion and increase of knowledge among men;" and I think within the last thirty years we have given a very large sum to the Smithsonian Institution for that special object.

I merely rose to say that the remark of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin was not, in my judgment, good law or good Constitution, and it certainly is not in accordance with the practice of the Government ever since its foundation.

I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. INGALLS. I offer an amendment, to come in at the close of section 2 of the bill:

Which property shall not be exempt from taxation.

I suppose the Senator from Vermont has no objection to that.

Mr. MORRILL. I have none at all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading? upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken; and resulted—yeas 31, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Allison,	Cameron of Pa.,	Hill of Georgia,	Platt,
Anthony,	Cameron of Wis.,	Kernan,	Pryor,
Bailey,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Saunders,
Booth,	Hamlin,	McPherson,	Slater,
Burnside,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Vest,
Butler,	Harris,	Morrill,	Williams.
Call,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,

NAYS—17.

Bayard,	Eaton,	Jones of Florida,	Vance,
Beck,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Whyte.
Cockrell,	Hereford,	Pendleton,
Coke,	Ingalls,	Plumb,
Davis of W. Va.,	Jonas,	Teller,

ABSENT—28.

Baldwin,	Garland,	Lamar,	Sharon,
Blair,	Gordon,	Logan,	Thurman,
Bruce,	Groome,	McDonald,	Voorhees,
Carpenter,	Grover,	Morgan,	Walker,
Conkling,	Hoar,	Randolph,	Wallace,
Davis of Illinois,	Johnston,	Ransom,	Windom,
Edmunds,	Kellogg,	Saulsbury,	Withers.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

NELSON LYON AND JEREMIAH S. JAMES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2518) for the relief of Nelson Lyon and Jeremiah S. James, the consideration of which was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. There was an amendment reported by the Committee on Patents.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That amendment was agreed to when the bill was formerly under consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MARY LEGGETT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 985) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Leggett, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Mary Leggett, widow of Robert Leggett, late lieutenant-colonel of the Tenth Connecticut Volunteers, to date from September 18, 1874.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out "to date from September 18, 1874," and insert "from the passage of this act," unless there is some good reason for the back pension.

Mr. INGALLS. Such has been the uniform custom of the committee. I do not know what the particular circumstances are in this case.

Mr. PLATT. I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he vary his amendment to say "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," which I believe is the usual form. Will that be satisfactory?

Mr. COCKRELL. The universal rule of the Committee on Pensions, as I understand, has been to make all pensions granted by act of Congress commence from the date of the passage of the act.

Mr. PLATT. Certainly, and the amendment which I suggest would have that effect, and it is the usual language employed in pension bills, "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That produces precisely the effect the Senator from Missouri wants.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will agree to strike out "to date from September 18, 1874," and insert in lieu thereof "subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified. The amendment was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT BONDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1148) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District," approved June 10, 1879; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments. The first amendment was, in line 10, after the word "bonds," to strike out:

Provided, The amount of both the registered and coupon bonds so issued shall not exceed the amount of $1,200,000; and that the Secretary of the Treasury,

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Upon the terms and conditions and in the manner provided in said act; and the Secretary of the Treasury.

So as to read:

That the act entitled "An act authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District," approved June 10, 1879, be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to authorize the commissioners of said District to issue registered bonds as well as coupon bonds upon the terms and conditions and in the manner provided in said act; and the Secretary of the Treasury be, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 19, after the word "District," to strike out "in the redemption of the said funded indebtedness of said District," and to insert:

At not less than their par value, in the redemption of the said funded indebtedness of said District: Provided, That the amount of both the registered and coupon bonds so issued or exchanged, with those already issued under said act, shall not exceed the amount of $1,200,000, as provided in said act of June 10, 1879.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, I should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Secretary to read chapter 17 of the Statutes of the Forty-sixth Congress, first session, being the act of June 10, 1879, which will explain the whole matter.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

An act authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to prepare, execute, and deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States bonds of the District of Columbia, bearing interest not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum, and payable twenty years after date, to the amount of not more than $1,200,000, the proceeds to be used only for the redemption of funded indebtedness of said District or of the late municipal corporations of Washington and Georgetown which became due January 1 and March 1, 1879, or those now existing and payable at pleasure, for the redemption of which the sinking fund of said District may not provide. Said 5 per cent. bonds shall be in such form and denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall approve, and shall be numbered consecutively and registered in the office of the auditor of said District, and also in the office of the Register of the Treasury of the United States, in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, and shall bear the seal of the District of Columbia: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to make the Government of the United States liable for either the principal or interest of said bonds, or any part thereof.

Said bonds shall be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury to the highest bidder upon public tender, but for not less than their par value, after being advertised for one week in two daily newspapers in the city of Washington and two in the city of New York. The bids shall be opened by the Secretary of the Treasury and the awards approved by him. The money realized from the sale of said bonds shall be paid out by the Secretary of the Treasury only for the purposes named in this act.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of all acts conflicting herewith, and the acts or parts of acts authorizing said commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue bonds to redeem certain bonds of said District falling due January 1st and March 1st, 1879, no bonds having been issued thereunder, are hereby repealed.

Approved June 10, 1879.

Mr. HARRIS. The only object of this bill is to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue, as the purchasers or takers of this loan may prefer, either registered or coupon bonds. It does not change the act of 1879 in any other respect.

I will state further that at the time a portion of this loan was taken it was the opinion of the Treasury Department, the opinion of the banker taking the loan, and the opinion of the commissioners of the District of Columbia that under the act of the 10th of June they had a perfect right to issue either registered or coupon bonds; but recently the Treasury Department has decided that the power does not exist under the act of 1879, and hence the necessity for this bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator in charge of this bill what is the rate of interest at which these bonds are issued?

Mr. HARRIS. The rate of interest fixed by the act of the 10th of June is 5 per cent. The question was debated by the Senator from West Virginia himself and others at the time the act of June last was under consideration, and the Senate then determined to fix the rate of interest on these bonds at 5 per cent.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Not exceeding 5 per cent.

Mr. HARRIS. Not exceeding 5 per cent. The bonds, so far as they have been sold at all, have sold for a premium up to this time; and the only object of this bill is to authorize registered as well as coupon bonds, either, as the taker of the loan may prefer.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I ask the Senator whether the full amount of bonds has been issued?

Mr. HARRIS. Oh, no; they may have been prepared to be issued, but they have not been sold and taken.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Inasmuch as the rate of interest has very materially changed since the passage of the law, does he not think the bonds could be sold for par at a less rate of interest than 5 per cent.? At the time of the passage of the law the Senate will recollect that 4½ per cent. was the lowest interest the Government had put any great amount of its bonds at. Since then it is known that 4 per cent. bonds have sold at a premium, and to-day the 4 per cent. bond of the Government, I believe, is selling at between 106 and 107. If all these bonds have not been issued, I ask the Senator whether he thinks they could be marketed at a less rate than 5 per cent.? If so, it is the duty of those having charge of the subject to see that a lower rate is secured. Under the law I see the interest is not to exceed 5 per cent., so that it may be four-and-a-half or some other rate. I submit it to the Senator from Tennessee for his own consideration.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question? Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. These bonds I understand are not exempt from local taxation; or are they?

Mr. HARRIS. I know of no statute of exemption.

Mr. ALLISON. That, I submit, will account for the difference in the rate of interest.

Mr. HARRIS. There is another reason that will account for the difference: The credit of the District of Columbia is not quite equal, in my judgment, to that of the United States, and the District of Columbia has not heretofore been able, and I fear it will never be able, to borrow money exactly on the same terms as the United States can borrow money. But I do not think it would be wise at this time to change the rate of interest, inasmuch as these bonds are prepared bearing the rate of 5 per cent. interest, and the commissioners of the District of Columbia and the Secretary of the Treasury recommend the passage of this bill, and neither recommends any change in the rate of interest for the remaining bonds.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The Senator of course does not understand me as opposing the bill. What I said was more in the nature of a suggestion. The question the Senator from Iowa asked is a very important one. Did I understand the chairman of the District Committee to answer it?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know of any exemption.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. So these bonds are taxable as other property in the District. That would make a material difference, of course.

Mr. ROLLINS. There is no provision exempting these bonds from taxation; and there is a proviso in the law that perhaps affects the value of the bonds in the market. I refer to a proviso in these words:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to make the Government of the United States liable for either the principal or interest of said bonds, or any part thereof.

Mr. BLAINE. That puts 1 per cent. on the rate. It had better be left at 5.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I submit to my friend from Maine that I only made a suggestion. The law itself provides that the rate shall not exceed 5 per cent., and it is in the power of the commissioners now, if in their judgment the loan can be negotiated at 4½ per cent., to do so.

Mr. ROLLINS. This proviso undoubtedly causes an extra rate of interest of at least 1 per cent. We pay at least 1 per cent. more interest on these bonds than we should have to pay if this proviso was not in the original act. Congress insists on keeping it there, and of course the District has to pay a larger rate of interest in consequence.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARTHUR W. IRVING.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1072) granting a pension to Arthur W. Irving; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Arthur W. Irving, late a bugler in Company C, One hundred and fourth Regiment New York Volunteers.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. CALL on the 16th of February, 1880:

[To accompany bill S. No. 1072.]

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 1072) granting a pension to Arthur W. Irving, respectfully report as follows:

That this case was before the Forty-fifth Congress, and that the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives of that body submitted the following report:

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Arthur W. Irving, asking for pension as bugler in Company C, One hundred and fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, have had the same under consideration, and ask leave to submit the following report:

"It appears from the evidence on file that the soldier was passed into the service after two rigid examinations, and was then sound in every respect, and free from rheumatism especially. That he was attacked with typhoid fever and sent to hospital, and that it resulted in rheumatism, which has continued to grow gradually worse, until it has become chronic and produced a permanent stiffening and curvature of the spine, and is now wholly disabled from earning his living by manual labor. The evidence is conclusive that the soldier was sound when he entered the service, that he contracted his disease in the service of the United States and in the line of his duty, and that his disease has become chronic. The committee therefore report back said petition with the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage."

Your committee, after a careful examination of the testimony presented, would concur in the above report and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask some Senator on the Pension Committee if the Commissioner of Pensions rejected this application?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. The Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] had charge of the case.

Mr. CALL. I understand the application was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EGBERT OLCOTT.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 235) granting an increase of pension to Egbert Olcott; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to grant an increase of pension to Egbert Olcott, formerly colonel of the One hundred and twenty-first New York Volunteers, equal to the special rate provided for the loss of both hands or both feet, or the sight of both eyes, by act of Congress approved June 17, 1878.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DANIEL M. APPEL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 1075) to authorize Dr. Daniel M. Appel, of the United States Army, to receive pay for discharging the duties of physician to the Mescalero Apache Indian agency, New Mexico; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

L. H. HERSHFIELD & BROTHER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. MORRILL. The next bill on the Calendar is a House bill that it will not take two minutes to pass, it having received the unanimous report of the Committee on Finance; and it is one of those cases which I think ought to have early action. I ask unanimous consent that the next bill on the Calendar may be considered at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3559) for the relief of L. H. Hershfield & Brother. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be issued to L. H. Hershfield & Brother, bankers, of Helena, Montana, or their order, a duplicate check for $2,476.81, which check shall be paid out of the Treasury in lieu of check No. 1578 issued to L. H. Hershfield & Brother, in payment for bullion bar No. 1034, by Russell B. Hamson, assayer in charge of the United States assay office at Helena, Montana Territory, and payable by the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, which check was lost in transmission. L. H. Hershfield & Brother are to execute a good and sufficient bond in double the amount, in manner and form prescribed by section 3646 of the Revised Statutes in case of checks not exceeding in amount $1,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND PATENTS OF INSANE CLAIMANTS.

Mr. PADDOCK. I now renew my request that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 1404. I think it will not take more than five minutes to pass the bill; and there is a very urgent case indeed in Minnesota which calls for prompt action.

Mr. BLAINE. Under the restriction that it may be objected to at any time?

Mr. PADDOCK. Certainly.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 1404) to provide for issuing patents for public lands claimed under the pre-emption and homestead laws in cases where the claimants have become insane.

Mr. PADDOCK. In line 15 the word "should" should be changed to "shall."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. There are amendments of the committee which should be first disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments of the committee will be disposed of in their order.

The amendments reported from the Committee on Public Lands were, in line 5, after the word "laws," to strike out "may or shall have become insane at" and insert "have become insane or shall hereafter become insane before;" and in line 19, after the word "of," to strike out "citizenship" and insert "an affidavit of allegiance by the applicant in certain cases;" so as to make the bill read:

That in all cases in which parties who regularly initiated claims to public lands as settlers thereon according to the provisions of the pre-emption or homestead laws, have become insane or shall hereafter become insane before the expiration of the time during which their residence, cultivation, or improvement of the land claimed by them is required by law to be continued in order to entitle them to make the proper proof and perfect their claims, it shall be lawful for the required proof and payment to be made for their benefit by any person who may be legally authorized to act for them during their disability, and thereupon their claims shall be confirmed and patented, provided it should be shown by proof satisfactory to the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the parties complied in good faith with the legal requirements up to the time of their becoming insane, and the requirement in homestead entries of an affidavit of allegiance by the applicant in certain cases as a prerequisite to the issuing of the patents shall be dispensed with so far as regards such insane parties.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. PADDOCK. In line 15 I move to strike out the word "should" and insert "shall;" so as to read "shall be shown."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS ON OSAGE LANDS.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the second order of business succeeding the one which was last reached on the Calendar, and I desire to give this reason for preferring the request at this time: This is a bill which passed the House at the extra session; it is one which concerns very nearly a large number of people in my State, and it is important that it should pass now. I expect to be absent unavoidably next week. I should not ask this if the Senate were to be in session to-morrow, because it would then be reached in regular order. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2326.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot consent to give way the Geneva award bill, which is the unfinished business.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it will not take longer than to read the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, it had better come up on Monday.

Mr. INGALLS. My colleague is to be absent next week.

Mr. PLUMB. I expect to be absent unavoidably next week, or I should not prefer the request at this time.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, let the bill be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. No. 2326) for the relief of settlers upon the Osage trust and diminished-reserve lands in Kansas, and for other purposes.

Mr. THURMAN. That will take time.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not see any reason why it should.

Mr. THURMAN. I have heard several Senators say they wanted to understand that bill, and I do not think they can do it in ten minutes.

Mr. PLUMB. Then I will make a request which I have no doubt will be acceptable. I do not care to test the sense of the Senate upon the bill now, in view of the statement of the Senator from Ohio, because I do not want to get into a debate now to make any delay. I therefore ask that when this bill shall be reached at the next call of the Calendar or the succeeding call of the Calendar it may be passed without prejudice, remaining at the head of the Calendar during next week.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WITHERS. I cannot consent to that—to take the bill up in advance and place it at the head of the Calendar.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Virginia will allow me to suggest that I am sure he will not object to the request that the Senator from Kansas makes now. He asks if the bill is reached during his absence that it may stand until he returns.

Mr. WITHERS. I misunderstood the request entirely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas.

LEAVENWORTH MILITARY PRISON.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill No. 1319. This is a bill which was referred to the Military Committee by the Secretary of War and passed the committee unanimously; and within a day or two I have had a letter from General Pope, who has command of the prison at Fort Leavenworth, asking for speedy action on the bill. Therefore I ask that it be taken up at this time.

Mr. THURMAN. Let that bill be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. No. 1319) authorizing the Secretary of War to expend the profits growing out of the manufacture of articles at the military prison at Leavenworth, Kansas, for the improvement of facilities for manufacture at said prison.

Mr. THURMAN. If a vote can be taken on the bill without any discussion, I will agree that the Geneva award bill may be laid aside informally; but if there is to be any discussion I must insist on the regular order.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I do not believe there will be any discussion, as I think the necessity of the bill is evident.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which provides that all moneys which have accrued or may hereafter accrue from the labor or from the proceeds of sales of articles produced by the labor of the prisoners confined in the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, may be applied to the support and maintenance of the prison and expended under the orders of the Secretary of War without further appropriation by Congress.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I should like to know what the amount of money involved is.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. About $7,000 at this time; an accumulation of profits from the labor of the convicts at the prison. It cannot now be made use of. They want to make use of it for prison purposes to increase their facilities.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. Mr. President—

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. If this bill is going to make any discussion, I shall have to withdraw it at present.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. No, I do not think it will make any discussion; but if the Senator wants it to go over, very well.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. No, I should like to have it passed now.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. While I make no objection to this bill, yet it is a bad practice to allow money to be used under a reappropriation without its going properly into the Treasury; and as a rule I shall object to that kind of appropriation. It ought to go regularly into the Treasury and be appropriated specifically.

Mr. BECK. Entertaining the same views that the Senator from West Virginia does, believing that all these moneys ought to go into the Treasury and be properly appropriated, I shall oppose the bill. I desire to say here that for the last twelve years our struggle has been all the time to require the sales of public property to be accounted for by all the Departments, and all the money that was received to go into the Treasury and be placed in the annual estimates submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury. We succeeded at last in requiring that to be done, and it is now done regularly. The Committee on Appropriations have a bill now ready to lay before Congress, with the consent of the Secretary of the Treasury, requiring that that shall be done everywhere, and that there shall be no permanent appropriations except so far as the sinking fund and interest on the public debt and two or three other things are concerned. This in a very small way is just the breaking down of the rule that we have been trying to establish, and that we propose to enforce in the bill changing from permanent to annual appropriations, which is to come before Congress in a few days. If it is done here it will be done somewhere else; all such things begin in a small way. If we allow this to be done here, it will be done everywhere else. There can be no possible harm in requiring all the sales made to be accounted for and the money reappropriated, so that we shall know exactly what is sold, what it brings, how it is sold, and how the money realized is to be used. I shall object to the consideration of this bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate has given consent that it be now considered. It is now before the Senate. Does the Senator from Kentucky submit any motion?

Mr. BECK. No, I will make no motion; but I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that while this is not very large in itself as to the amount, it is just as vicious in principle as if it involved millions. It is by these little insignificant things that the principle we have sought to establish is undermined all the time. I shall only reserve the right to call for the yeas and nays, and vote against the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I fear there is going to be a discussion of this bill. I call for the regular order.

GENEVA AWARD FUND.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. EATON. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. PADDOCK. I simply ask the Senator to withdraw his motion for a moment until the Senator from South Carolina may report a bill.

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. I thought the honorable Senator from Ohio was intending to insist upon the consideration of the Geneva award bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I objected to laying the Geneva award bill aside unless it was to take a vote on the bill of the Senator from Pennsylvania, but I saw it would give rise to a discussion, and therefore I called for the regular order. In regard to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut, unless there is some Senator who wishes to speak on the Geneva award bill, I shall not antagonize that motion, because of the reason that he has stated to me of a somewhat pressing necessity for an executive session.

Mr. BLAINE. If there is not a gentleman indicating a desire to speak on the Geneva award bill—of that the Senator from Ohio is better advised than I, for I have no advice on the point—why not have a vote on it?

Mr. THURMAN. We cannot have a vote on it now.

Mr. BLAINE. It is not in my power to promote the consideration of the bill, but if the Senator from Ohio who has charge of it permits it to drift in this way, it will never come to a vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] wants to speak on it and he is absent. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] wants to speak on it, I think.

Mr. THURMAN. I have something to say upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] and until I shall have had that opportunity I cannot consent to a vote. I shall be willing to vote as quick as anybody, but I am sick and tired of insinuations that the delay of this bill is occasioned by the Judiciary Committee or by me.

Mr. BLAINE. I have made no insinuations of any kind whatever. Now, the Senator from Ohio will perceive that this bill, which has been probably more elaborately discussed than any bill that has been before Congress for twenty years, seems to be the one bill upon which the Senate is never called upon to vote, and it does drift. As I said before, I do not lay the fault at any man's door in particular, but it does drift in a most remarkable manner. The design originally announced of having this bill through the Senate in season to have it considered in the other House begins to look, and very soon will look, as if it were an impossibility. It is for the Senator from Ohio to say whether it shall be an impossibility or not.

SOLDIERS' REUNION IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. HAMPTON. I ask leave to make a report at this time. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 218) granting the use of artillery, tents, and so forth, at the soldiers' reunion to be held at Central City, Nebraska, have instructed me to report it without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. I must object to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

INTERNATIONAL CELEBRATION OF 1883.

Mr. EATON. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to ask the Chair a question. Is there any bill pending on the Calendar now before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is the consideration of the Geneva award bill.

Mr. KERNAN. But I wish the Senate to notice that the bill next in the regular call of the Calendar is Senate bill No. 1160. I ask that it be taken up and its title read so that it may be the Calendar bill for Monday. Two bills that have been passed over have been ordered ahead of this for Monday. I think this bill ought to take its proper place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first bill on the Calendar on the next call is the bill (S. No. 1160) to provide for celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the treaty of peace and the recognition of American Independence by holding an international exhibition of arts, manufactures, and the products of the soil and mine, in the city of New York, in the State of New York, in the year 1883.

Mr. KERNAN. That will stand at the head of the Calendar on Monday?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It would, except for the two bills that were preferred this morning.

Mr. KERNAN. I think the gentlemen in charge of those bills will not object to my request, as I did not object to theirs. As this bill is now next in order and has been pending a good while, I hope they will allow it to be taken up to-day so that it may stand before those two. I hope the Senators will yield to that. The gentlemen say they have no objection to that. I ask that it be taken up now and read by its title and then the Senator from Connecticut can make his motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the title of Senate bill No. 1160.

Mr. ALLISON. That will be subject to objection on Monday, of course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. I renew my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Pending the execution of the order closing the doors, may I ask what is the first bill to be taken up on Monday?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the Anthony rule?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill just reported.

SUPREME COURT REPORTS.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1493) defining the duties of reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, fixing his compensation, and providing for the publishing and distributing of said reports, was yesterday postponed indefinitely, was reconsidered and the bill was placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and forty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 25, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. DAVID WILLS, D. D., of Washington, District of Columbia.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. On yesterday the question arose whether the Journal of the prior day's proceedings should be read, and the Chair submitted the question to the House. The House made a decision thereon under a ye-a-and-nay vote. A like question is presented to-day, in the opinion of the Chair, as on yesterday as to procedure in the same respect, and the Chair will submit the question to the House touching the Journal of yesterday's proceedings. The Chair thinks this is just, equitable, and right, so that the House should again have to-day an opportunity of expressing by its vote its judgment as to the reading at this time of the Journal of yesterday in the same manner as the House expressed its opinion on yesterday as to the Journal of the preceding day.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rose to make the point of order that the Journal of yesterday's proceedings should now be read. That will bring up the very point the Chair proposes to submit to the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear it.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Is not that in effect submitting to the House the question whether they will suspend the first rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair ruled yesterday that it was not, on the ground that the House possesses the right to control the manner of its proceeding.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. The House, then, has the right to suspend any rule by a majority vote.

The SPEAKER. The House puts a construction and an interpretation on a rule. The House yesterday put an interpretation on the two rules, Rule I and Rule IX, as to the Journal of the prior day, which construction was an instruction to the Chair in that respect.

Mr. HAYES. Was that action of the House a decision covering all such cases, or did it apply merely to the Journal of Tuesday?

The SPEAKER. That decision related to the Journal of Tuesday's proceedings. A similar decision to-day would relate of course to the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. BLAND. I would inquire whether or not the rule provides that the Speaker shall decide all points of order subject to an appeal to the House; and if the House has not the right to have the opinion of the Speaker upon the construction of any rule, and if that construction does not meet the views of the House the proper remedy is an appeal from the ruling of the Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It has never been anywhere denied that the Speaker is the voice of the House, and must execute the wish of the House.

Mr. BLAND. My point is whether or not the House has not a right to have from the Speaker a construction of the rules. The rules provide that the Speaker shall decide all points of order; it is not a question for the House. If the House shall differ from the Speaker, then his construction can be corrected by an appeal to the House. I call for the reading of the rule on that point.

The Clerk read clause 4 of Rule I, as follows:

He shall sign all acts, addresses, joint resolutions, writs, warrants, and subpoenas of, or issued by order of the House, and decide all questions of order subject to an appeal by any member, on which appeal, no member shall speak more than once, unless by permission of the House.

Mr. BLAND. Now I consider it the duty of the Speaker under that rule to decide the point of order whether by the rule it is not required that the Journal of the proceedings of the House of the preceding day be read before the House proceeds to any business. If any member dissents from the opinion of the Chair he will have a right to appeal.

The SPEAKER. The Chair entertains a different view of his duty from that expressed by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAND.] The Chair repeats that he is the servant of the House, the voice of the House, and conforms to its directions.

Mr. BLAND. There is the plain rule, requiring the Speaker to decide points of order. He may submit other questions to the House, but I think the rule contemplates that the Speaker shall first give his opinion for the information of the House upon the construction of a rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes the instruction of the House and proceeds in harmony therewith.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rose for the purpose of making the point of order that I made yesterday, that under the first clause of Rule I the only business now in order is the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. If the gentleman will yield to me, I desire to submit a proposition to the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. During my experience in this House I have on more than one occasion, probably twenty times, seen the House involved in a difficulty similar to the present one; and I have also always seen, after each side has struggled for a certain period, the difficulty amicably adjusted, and the transaction of the proper business of the House resumed.

Now, in view of the experience of the past two days' sessions, I think the time has arrived when the members of this House as sensible men, desirous of prosecuting their legislative labors, should pause and come to some amicable adjustment of this question. It is after all but a technical difficulty, a technical difficulty which of itself is probably of little practical importance as affecting any result. Yet it appears to me one of great magnitude so far as it operates to delay the business of Congress.

I therefore submit this proposition to the House, to both sides of the House, because upon this question I state here sincerely and distinctly that I hold a position not entirely in accord with that of either side of the House. I think this matter is susceptible of amicable adjustment, by which both sides can maintain their rights and the House can retain its integrity and its dignity. My proposition is that the Journals of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday be now approved, and that immediately thereafter, and without debate, the House will proceed to vote upon the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 5265, and that said bill be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

It does appear to me that by the adoption of this proposition we will accomplish all that we can accomplish if we continue the proceedings of yesterday through the entire session of to-day. The Journals of the preceding days of this week will be approved, and the House will be brought to a direct vote upon the proposition as to what reference this bill shall have; the bill being remanded back to the House, and the House then voting upon its reference. It appears to me that gentlemen on neither side of the House can object to my proposition.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does that proposition carry with it the reservation of the right to a division of the question?

The SPEAKER. That would be regulated by the rules.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I suppose that under the rules there are two distinct propositions in the resolution—first to discharge the committee, and secondly to make a different reference; but I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not embarrass the proposition by asking for any division whatever.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no disposition to embarrass that proposition or to delay the work of this House. The only point for which I and those with whom I have been acting have been struggling from the first was to protect the Journal of this House from alteration or mutilation. When that is secured, and the integrity of that Journal is guaranteed, I have no further fight to make. It is now simply a question whether the Journals of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday shall in their natural and regular order be approved and this proposition of the gentleman from New York be then voted upon immediately without debate, or whether the cart shall be put before the horse by first voting upon this resolution and then by an anomalous process going back and approving the Journals. This is a technicality upon which I do not propose to delay this House by any contest. I think the gentleman's proposition is eminently correct and fair; and I am entirely content with it. I speak only for myself, for I have no right to speak for anybody else.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Will a two-thirds vote be necessary to carry the last proposition of the gentleman from New York?

The SPEAKER. This proposition, the Chair supposes, if adopted, is to be agreed to without dissent.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I understand that a majority vote will be all that will be necessary to carry the proposition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me a moment I wish to inquire whether the gentleman from New York will admit one amendment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I prefer not to yield now. Let me first get through what I have to say.

Mr. Speaker, I approve of the proposition offered by the gentleman from New York. I think it will bring about a satisfactory result—satisfactory, at least, to those gentlemen with whom I have been associated on this floor. I therefore hope that when the question comes before the House there will be no dilatory motion interposed, that there will be no further delay in reaching a final vote upon this question. I regard the proposition as eminently fair and proper.

Mr. Speaker, before taking my seat I desire to say something further. The questions which have heretofore been to some extent involved in the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] have entirely disappeared. A naked proposition concerning the tariff on salt, printing-paper, and type will soon be before the House stripped of all other questions whatever, technical or otherwise—a simple, plain, square proposition as to whether the bill introduced by me and which has been by the action of this House sent to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws shall remain there until reported for action in the House, which that committee is very likely to do, or whether it shall be sent to the Committee on Ways and Means and forever put to sleep by that committee.

I would say, Mr. Speaker, that those who have been opposed to this bill have endeavored to interject into this controversy side issues, questions which in my judgment ought never to have been brought in. Yet I can easily perceive why such issues have been thrown in here. It has been done in order to lead into ambush gentlemen on this floor who conscientiously are in favor of the passage of the bill that I have introduced.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Mr. Speaker, is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Illinois ought to be allowed under the circumstances to make his statement in his own way.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hope, Mr. Speaker, I shall not be interrupted. I am perfectly willing to be asked any question after I am through by any gentleman on either side. But I hope I shall be permitted first to finish my remarks.

Mr. BREWER. If the debate is to be extended I shall object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not indicated to the Chair that he desires any extended debate.

Mr. BREWER. A suggestion that the gentleman made seemed to me to imply that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am simply speaking in explanation of my own position and in advocacy of the proposition introduced by the gentleman from New York. I will say, as my attention has been very kindly called to it in a side remark by my friend from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] that I have no desire here to say anything that will excite or anger any gentleman. I know that I am sensitive when any reflection is cast upon the integrity of my motives. I confess that I am sensitive under any imputation upon the motives governing my public or private actions. Mr. Speaker, I would not respect any man who is not sensitive when his honor or integrity is assailed. He who would not resent an unjust imputation upon the integrity of his motives, or is callous to a charge of having acted in bad faith or done that which will not admit of the most explicit explanation, is a man unworthy of the fellowship of the better class of gentlemen who occupy seats on this floor. He is one who is only fitted for companionship with the base and the degraded.

I may have shown too much warmth, but it was only because of the rectitude of motives and a consciousness in my own heart I was innocent of any charge of impropriety, and because I had been brutally and unjustly assailed. Under these circumstances I was provoked to resent the imputation in the language which I employed on last Tuesday, and which I am perfectly willing to say here I have not a single word or syllable to retract, but propose to stand by my utterances on that occasion.

What is the charge which has been brought against me? Am I charged with having brought in a bill for the purpose of subsidizing some overgrown monopoly? Am I charged with bringing in a bill here under false colors, which would give from the national Treasury the public funds to a private individual, by which I might possibly gain profit? No, sir. The bill I have brought in has been read at the Clerk's desk. Does it embrace a revision of the large number of pages of the Revised Statutes which the gentleman from Pennsylvania said involved the tariff laws? There are only three articles touched in that bill. One is to relieve salt from taxation; another is to relieve from tax all printing-paper and materials entering into its manufacture; and the other is to relieve all printing-type from taxation and place said articles on the free list. That is what there is in the bill. It is simply to relieve the poor man's bread from an onerous burden and to relieve knowledge from taxation. That is all there is in that bill.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Not now.

Mr. FRYE. Then I call the gentleman to order and demand the regular order shall be proceeded with. The gentleman is discussing the question of the tariff. I understood him to rise to a matter personal to himself.

The SPEAKER. The Chair accorded to the gentleman from Illinois (under the circumstances, having introduced the bill in controversy) the floor in order that he might have an opportunity of placing himself in such manner as he might see fit before the House. That is all. A point of order is made against the gentleman, and he must speak to the subject of the proposition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I am addressing myself as closely as I can to it, and I was simply endeavoring to show my motives in bringing this bill before the House, and the propriety of my friends on this side agreeing to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, so that we may have a square vote on this bill. I hope my friends will bear with me, because I do not wish to say anything that will be unfair to any one on either side, but I wish to put the matter in a fair, just, and intelligent manner before the House and country.

On last Tuesday I was sought to be assailed through a correspondent of the New York World. The article which was then read at the desk was presented as an indictment against me for bringing in and having referred this bill. I allude to this article:

THE PROTECTIONISTS OUTWITTED.
[Special dispatch to the World.]

WASHINGTON, March 22, 1880.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, very cleverly outwitted the anti-reform tariff men and the Ways and Means Committee of the House to-day by getting a tariff bill referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, of which he is a member. His bill bore a very simple title, proposing to amend a section of the Revised Statutes, and when the title was read no one, not even CONGER, suspected the real purpose of the bill, which was to admit, free of duty, salt, paper, printing machinery and types, and all chemicals entering into the composition of paper. Heretofore all efforts to refer tariff bills to committees other than that on Ways and Means have met with formidable opposition by the republicans and democratic protectionists, together with that other class of democrats who prefer not even indirectly to vote a lack of confidence in the leading committee of the House. To-night the tariff reformers are rejoicing over the success of TOWNSHEND's scheme, while the protectionists and those averse to any change in the tariff laws at this session are correspondingly perplexed. There is no doubt that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws will favorably report Mr. TOWNSHEND's bill at the earliest opportunity, and as the desire has been all along simply to get some tariff proposition before the House, it will matter little now whether or not the Ways and Means Committee does anything at all this session.

A gentleman on this floor made the inquiry "who had caused that dispatch to be sent to the New York World;" and I have seen it stated in some paper that I had inspired the dispatch mentioned, or had something to do with sending it. I wish to state that I never met the correspondent of the New York World but once in my life of which I have any recollection whatever, and that was something like a month and a half ago, when he called on me to know what was the nature of the bill I had introduced relating to the election of President and Vice-President of the United States. That is the first and last time I ever met that gentleman to know him. I will say further, I have no recollection of mentioning that bill to any one until the day the attack was made on me, save to one or two gentlemen who were of my Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and then only incidentally, without any desire to boast of it; nor did I in any manner seek or desire that any newspaper correspondents should give me credit for what I had done. As the New York World has been alluded to, and as I shall base my remarks hereafter on the point which has been raised therein, I desire the Clerk to read the extract I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

The evidence furnished in the House yesterday that Mr. GARFIELD reads the World promptly and carefully is very gratifying to us. It would be still more gratifying, however, if with it came proof to show that Mr. GARFIELD lays to heart the lessons which he finds in the World. But he was far from giving us such proof yesterday. When Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, dealt with the tariff before the House by its number, as the apostle dealt with the beast in the Apocalypse, he had a right to assume that Mr. GARFIELD would know what he was talking about. How otherwise are bills to be known than by their numbers? Mr. TOWNSHEND's bill was read by its title, as all other bills are read. It was not requisite, nor would it have been decent, for Mr. TOWNSHEND to proclaim, for the edification of his ignorant fellow-members, by sound of trumpet, that his resolution referred to the tariff. It referred to the title under which the tariff is printed in the statutes. If men who support the tariff understand the tariff, how is it that they do not know the place of the tariff among our statutes? It was the business of the protectionists, and very specially of the members of the Ways and Means Committee, of which Mr. GARFIELD is a shining ornament, to know what the title of the tariff is. Mr. GARFIELD and his coadjutors have nobody but themselves to blame if the monopolists whom they represent have been caught napping by a resolute reformer, and their attempt to prevent the opening of the question of tariff reform by falsifying the record of the House is more objectionable, not only than anything of which they pretend to accuse Mr. TOWNSHEND, but than anything done even by Mr. GARFIELD heretofore in the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. This is an editorial in that paper of yesterday. Now, Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted by my friend from Maine, I desired further to remark that none but the most reckless prevaricator, none but a person entirely destitute of truth would insinuate that I could in any possible manner put dishonest money in my purse by the passage of the bill which has been presented. The bill will operate mainly in the interest of the weak and of the poor, of those who are unable to reward me pecuniarily. It is not a bill to subsidize some powerful monopoly; its purpose is to destroy monopoly. The only reward that I can ever have hereafter for the action I have taken is the consciousness that I have faithfully endeavored to discharge my duty. And while that might be regarded as an insignificant consideration to those who have grown wealthy under the tariff laws, I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I value it more highly than I would the most splendid jewel in the crown of England's Queen.

Now, the question before the House finally will be whether the bill which I introduced shall be taken from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. But before we reach that question there is one which I desire to discuss; it is that which relates to bringing that bill into the House and asking its reference to the Committee on Revision of Laws. I have done nothing unusual, nothing inadmissible by the rules and practice of the House, nothing that will not be justified after the most careful and searching scrutiny of any fair-minded man on or off this floor. What have I done? I have introduced that bill into this House. Can any man on this floor question my right on Monday to introduce a bill as a member of this body, holding, as I do, equal authority here with the oldest or the youngest member? When I presented and sent, after the call of my State for bills, that one to the Clerk's desk, I had a right to do so. I then asked that it be referred to the committee already mentioned. This is the right, Mr. Speaker, that is exercised by every gentleman on this floor. I clearly have the right to request the bill be sent to the committee that I preferred, in order that it might be perfected and reported. The question then remained as to whether the bill should be given to the committee desired by me, and it was referred by those having authority to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. It was done in the open House, and no member made any objection whatever.

But it is said I gave no indication in the title of that bill as to the subject-matter of it except by numerals, and that is the gravamen of the charge which has been made against the bill and against me for so drawing it. In response to that, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I have done nothing unusual in this respect. The title of the bill was "to revise and amend sections 2503, 2504, and 2505, title 33 of the Revised Statutes of the United States." Gentlemen say that they did not recognize what was the nature of that bill when the title was read from the Clerk's desk. That is no fault of mine; it is a reflection upon their intelligence. There are gentlemen on this floor whose whole official duty, or nearly their entire duty, is concentrated in the business arising under title 33 of the Revised Statutes. The ordinary member is aware, or ought to be aware, of the fact that title 33 relates only to customs duties, and yet it is confessed by gentlemen on the Ways and Means Committee that they knew nothing of the nature of the bill by its title. If the gentlemen on that committee are capable of dealing with questions of the tariff they certainly ought to remember the title of the law under which they are acting. Here was a bill relating exclusively to title 33, and which title relates only to the tariff, and yet they openly state that they did not know the nature of the bill, and therefore did not object to its reference to the Committee on Revision of Laws.

Now, it has also been stated here and repeated that the bill should state by its title the substance of the law affected, and that it was an unusual method of procedure not to indicate its subject-matter in the title, and that therefore I have been guilty of practicing deceit by bringing in a bill here which failed to comply with that condition. It is spoken of by some gentlemen with holy horror as an unprecedented, an improper thing for me to do. Is it wrong to simply describe the act I desire to repeal by the enumeration of the sections and the title of the statutes to which it relates? If it is, the wrong has grown into such a frequent practice that it is now an unwritten rule. I hold in my hand ninety-seven bills introduced into this present Congress, every one of them having a title upon them exactly of the same nature as the title I put on the tariff bill which has provoked all this discussion. Ninety-seven bills into this Congress have been introduced by gentlemen on both sides of the House, and if you examine the titles you will find the same description exactly as that made by me in the title of the bill which I introduced.

Mr. CONGER. Were they all referred to the appropriate committees?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me until I finish my statement.

Mr. CONGER. I only desire to know whether the bills to which the gentleman refers were all appropriately referred.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will meet that question as I proceed. I will say now, however, and demonstrate it hereafter, that they were not all properly referred. Ninety-seven times during this session has the House permitted this to be done, and yet a howl is raised against me for doing this same thing this one time. And why? Because my bill would remove the tax from the poor man's salt, and the tax on paper and type in the interest of the dissemination of knowledge.

Mr. Chairman, the bills to which I have referred are here in my possession. I will read the title of some of them. About the first one that I lay my eyes on is one to which I wish to call special attention on account of some remarks made by a friend of mine on the other side in debate yesterday. I refer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] He knows well that I have great personal regard for him and nothing but good-will toward him. I have always respected him for his eminent abilities, and respected him for his integrity of character and for his desire to deal justly with all men. When the gentleman on yesterday criticised with some severity the action I am charged with in presenting this bill and having it referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, I must confess that I was surprised; for when I saw my venerable and venerated friend rise from his seat, I thought, as he is generally so full of the milk of human kindness, that he would view my action in the light of fair dealing and justice. But I soon found that he intended to indulge in unfair and unkind criticism upon my conduct.

I was sorry afterward that I was not more mindful of what perhaps would have saved me from the castigation which he indirectly inflicted upon me. I felt then that I should have gone to my friend before he rose from his seat and stated that there was no "pig-iron" in this bill, but that it was entirely for the benefit of the poor and suffering of his own and other districts. Had I done this, I believe instead of indulging in such criticisms of my actions he would have risen from his seat and called me blessed for endeavoring to accomplish so humane a purpose.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to respond now to that insinuation.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Wait until I have finished.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to make a response now to that.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I cannot yield now to the gentleman.

Mr. VALENTINE. I desire to ask whether this is proceeding by unanimous consent?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I have the floor by recognition of the Speaker. I desire to follow in the footsteps of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] I have a bill introduced by him on the 9th December last—

Mr. VALENTINE. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know if the gentleman from Illinois is proceeding by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois was allowed to make, as it were, a personal statement. The Chair thinks he should make that personal statement in his own way.

Mr. VALENTINE. Is the gentleman entitled to the floor to keep all other members off it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the following from the Digest:

When unanimous consent has been given for a personal explanation the member cannot be interrupted by a single objection. When the privilege (of making personal explanation) is given, the member must confine his remarks to the matter upon which he has been criticised, and in regard to which he has asked consent to make a personal explanation.

Mr. VALENTINE. Was unanimous consent asked and obtained?

The SPEAKER. There was no objection, and the gentleman from Illinois has been proceeding for some time.

Mr. VALENTINE. I know that; but I want to find out under what rule he is proceeding.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule and practice of the House which permit personal explanations, and because the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] yielded the floor for such explanation. Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I was about to remark that being a young member and looking for guidance in the drafting of bills and other legislative action, I felt I would be warranted in following the example of one who has for so long shown his skill in drafting bills. I have discovered that my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has introduced many bills into this House; and among them I find one which I will now read. If this House finds any ground for unkind criticism of me it should not forget that I have in this particular followed closely in the footsteps of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Let me read the title of the bill he brought in on the 9th day of December last:

To amend section 2981 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

No member was informed by that title whether the section related to the judiciary or the revenue.

Mr. KELLEY rose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman not to interrupt me.

That is one of the bills introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to which the gentleman gave no clearer title indicating its character than I gave to the bill which has provoked so much discussion.

Mr. KELLEY. Give me the number of that bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. It is No. 2552. I will allow the gentleman to take the bill, [sending it to Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That is not the only bill the gentleman has brought into this Congress of which the title does not indicate the purpose for which the bill was brought in except in numerals. I have here bill No. 3943, introduced by that gentleman on the 26th day of last January. The title of that bill, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, long after these new rules were under discussion in the House, reads as follows:

To amend sections 3694 and 3695 of the Revised Statutes.

Can any man on this floor tell me now to what those sections relate? I apprehend gentlemen who have positions on committees having jurisdiction over those sections could immediately answer me what the bill related to. I will pass this bill also to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I hold in my hand two bills presented by my friend from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and the titles of those bills are of the same description as the title of my bill. The title of one of them is:

To amend section 2505 of the Revised Statutes.

That is all there is in the title. I will not stop to enumerate others.

My friend from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] of the Committee on Ways and Means, and my friend from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] and Mr. FRYE, of Maine, and other members of this House have brought in bills of the same character. I wish to say before leaving this batch of bills that the gentleman from New York [Mr. STARIN] introduced a bill the title of which you will find upon examination is word for word and figure for figure the same as the title of the bill I introduced. It is a bill to amend the same sections and the very same title. Such has been the frequent practice in all former Congresses as well as in this.

Mr. VALENTINE. Where was that bill sent to? Was it not sent to the committee to which it ought to go under the rules?

Mr. FRYE. Was it not sent to the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I propose now to answer the question so anxiously asked from that side of the House. Gentlemen, when they are driven from the position that no deception is practiced by not mentioning in the title of the bill the exact character of the law that is to be repealed, fall back on this position: that the bills with titles of this description which were introduced were referred to the committees to which they belong. That is what I know my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] would answer, that he referred those bills to the committee to which they belong.

Mr. KELLEY. That is the answer I shall give when you permit me.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I shall candidly do him the justice, then, of anticipating his answer; and I want to address myself to that question as bearing on the very question before the House. A gentleman brings in a bill here. What is the first question he asks himself? It is: "To what committee shall I ask that this bill be sent?" Following his own judgment he says: "I will send this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary," for instance. He sends it there. It is his opinion that it belongs to the Judiciary Committee. But is there a member on this floor who has never found in his own experience or in the experience of others that mistakes in judgment have been made in giving direction to bills? It is often very difficult to determine to what committee a bill especially belongs. Indeed, we often find that bills are of a nature which will admit of reference to any one of several committees. Upon this point I desire to have read an extract from the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] I will have it read, because I regard him as the peer, if not the superior, of any one here or elsewhere upon American parliamentary law and practice.

The Clerk read as follows:

Therefore, it is the latter part of the amendment alone to which the objection seems to be urged. There are three, perhaps four, committees of the House to which this subject-matter might have been referred, not improperly, the Chair thinks. It might have been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, because it relates to the courts of justice and to the proceedings in the courts. It might have been referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, because it relates to a change of part of a certain statute. It might have been referred to the Committee on Elections, as it was in fact, because it affects the manner of electing members of Congress. Or perhaps it might have been referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, because it relates to a reduction of the number and salaries of the officers who are appointed under that Department.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish now to call the attention of the House to some of these bills that I hold in my hand, the most casual reading of which will show any one that they were referred to improper committees; bills, too, entitled in the same manner that my bill was entitled. The first is a bill introduced by the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. DAGGETT.] The simple title of that bill is "A bill to amend section 2326, title 32, of the Revised Statutes." The bill relates alone to the jurisdiction of the courts in mining cases. What did he do with that bill? All will concede that the bill properly belongs to the Committee on the Judiciary, because it relates to the jurisdiction of the courts. But what did he do with it? He sent it to the Committee on Mines and Mining. Did any gentleman on this side of the House get up here and accuse him of practicing a deception upon this House because he preferred to refer that bill to the Committee on Mines and Mining, instead of the Committee on the Judiciary?

I have in my hand another bill, one introduced by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VAN AERNAM.] It is a bill entitled "A bill to amend section 4693 of the Revised Statutes." That is all there is of the title. To what does the bill relate? It relates to the subject of pensions, and in my judgment should have gone to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. But what did my friend from New York do with it? Did he send it to the Committee on Invalid Pensions? No, sir; he sent that bill, relating to the subject of pensions, to the Committee on the Judiciary. Did any man on this floor rise in his place and arraign him on a charge of deception for having sent his bill to a wrong committee, because he perhaps preferred the Judiciary to that of the Pension Committee?

I will not waste further time of the House by enumerating the large number of other bills which I hold in my hand, and which as clearly belong to committees other than those to which they were sent.

I come now to another point, which I know is in the minds of some of these gentlemen here. It is whether I did not send the bill I introduced to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws rather than to the Committee on Ways and Means, because I did not wish to place it in the care and keeping of that committee. A word or two on that question, and I will be done.

Before answering that question, I desire to say that many members on this floor agree with me in judgment that this bill can very properly be sent to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws as well as to the Committee on Ways and Means. The duty of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws is to revise the laws. What is the meaning of the word "revise?" Refer to Worcester's Dictionary and you will find the meaning to be this: "To review with a view to correction and amendment." That is part of the definition of "revise." Now, in order to avoid the accusation of having practiced a deception on this House, I took the precaution not to rely alone on the definition of the word "revise," but in the very title of my bill I advertised this House of the fact that I desired not only to revise the sections of the statutes referred to but to "amend" them, as the title of the bill will show. If the Committee on the Revision of the Laws has no authority to amend the laws, why did no gentleman object to sending that bill to that committee? It is a principle of parliamentary practice, fundamental in its nature, that bills in their preparatory stages should be intrusted to friendly hands; in other words, that the preparation of bills should be first intrusted to friendly committees in order that they may be perfected for the final action of the legislative body.

Mr. DUNNELL. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Not now; wait till I get through. What was the first question which confronted me when I brought in that bill? I knew as well as I know that I am standing here that if I sent that bill to the Committee on Ways and Means it would be buried forever. I knew as well as I know anything that if I brought in that bill and sent it to the Committee on Ways and Means I would be sending it to a graveyard in which has been buried every bill in this Congress seeking reform in the tariff. Again I ask, what was the question with me? It was this: Shall I send this bill to that tomb of all bills upon this subject, or shall I put it in the possession of a committee that will not strangle it, that will not suppress it? I am one of those who believe that the Committee on the Revision of the Laws has the right, under the rules of this House, to consider just such a bill as this, and therefore, in order that the bill might live and be reported back to this House for the action of the majority of the representatives of the people, I asked that it should be sent to a friendly committee, and the House, not I alone, sent it there.

I know that bills touching the tariff have been sought to be sent to other committees, but the House has refused in two or three instances to grant the privilege, and sent them to the Committee on Ways and Means. But, sir, because this House by false pretenses, or one technical pretext and another, has been led to send certain bills to that graveyard, should that deter me from using all legitimate and proper parliamentary expedients to save the life of tariff-relief bills by sending them to friendly committees?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the gentleman from Illinois is abusing the privilege for which he was accorded the floor. He has no right to make these gratuitous and unfounded comments upon the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois must confine himself to—

Mr. FRYE. Confine himself to what?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Allow me to answer the remark of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.]

Mr. BRIGGS. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know whether the gentleman has the right to assail a committee of this House by a charge of "false pretenses."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not that right. He is proceeding under consent granted, as the Chair has stated, for explanation of a personal character.

A MEMBER. Let him go on with his confession.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. One word in answer to the criticism made in regard to my views about the Committee on Ways and Means. Bills of this character have been before that committee for months, and no action has been reached upon them, and we have been informed that the committee not long ago decided not to change the tariff laws. I say that the conduct of the committee justified me in fearing that if my bill were sent to the Committee on Ways and Means it would be buried, and buried forever. Therefore I exercised what I believe to be my privilege and asked this House to refer the bill to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. The House by its own act sent the bill to that committee. It was done in a fair and open manner. It was done in the same manner in which ninety-seven bills with titles using the same character of description that I have on my table were sent to committees during the present Congress. And I found on examination that such has been the practice in all Congresses of the past, or at least in all those Congresses of which the record has been examined by me.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my friends on this side of the House that the question now submitted is not one with regard to my own conduct; it is not a technical question as to whether the one or the other committee has the more rightful jurisdiction over this question. All such questions have disappeared from the issue. The result of our proceedings has brought us at last what we have so long coveted, a square vote upon the question whether there shall be free printing-paper, whether there shall be— [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. FRYE. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hope that my friends on this side— [Renewed cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will suspend.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I will merely say in conclusion that I desire this proposition shall be adopted and that— [Loud cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend.

Mr. KELLEY obtained the floor.

Mr. BLAND. Before this debate proceeds, I desire to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] whether he will allow to be added to his resolution one more proposition upon which we can have a separate vote. I take it every member desires to express himself distinctly by a yea-and-nay vote on this question. My proposition is—

Mr. KELLEY. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. BLAND. I submit this proposition for the consideration of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and others, that there be added to the resolution of the gentleman from New York a provision that the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to report the bill back within three weeks, so that each member of the House may vote directly upon the proposition. Let all these propositions be voted upon, and that will settle this question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.] For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KELLEY. For the purpose of replying, as I was promised I should have the opportunity of doing, to the personal allusions to me made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND.]

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. KELLEY. I would like the same freedom in this respect the gentleman had, because my good faith was impugned by him. [Cries of "No objection!"]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be allowed reasonable time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will be allowed all the time he desires.

Mr. KELLEY. An appeal was made to me directly for an explanation of my action in presenting bills.

Mr. SIMONTON. Does this proceed by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois proceeded by consent to make a personal explanation. Now the gentleman from Pennsylvania states that he was reflected upon by remarks of the gentleman from Illinois in that personal explanation, and asks time to reply.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to say that I do not think it necessary for the gentleman to have unanimous consent. I think he has the right to be heard on the proposition before the House. I hope he will be permitted to go on.

Mr. SIMONTON. The gentleman from Illinois referred to other gentleman in the course of his remarks. Is each of these to have an hour for debate? I do not want to object, but—

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Pennsylvania wanted but three minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir, I did not ask for three minutes. I could not in three minutes repeat what the gentleman from Illinois said about me.

Mr. FRYE. I think you might reply to it in less time.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask to be permitted to go on without limitation. I cannot tell how long it may be necessary to occupy. I want to refer to what the gentleman said. I want to examine the bills presented by me which the gentleman has exhibited as presenting him an example which he was proud to follow. I cannot tell just how long I may take. Whether I shall permit questions will depend on the time allowed me. [Cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire first to thank the gentleman from Illinois for the opportunity he has afforded me of saying what I am about to say, and to reciprocate all he said touching the matter of mutual esteem. Until this transaction came to light there were few gentlemen on this floor for whom I had a higher personal regard, with no more intimate relations than existed between us, but I must confess that the coming to light of the matter now under consideration has changed my feelings from warmth to coolness and inquiry. Let me first refer to these bills the reference of which by me the gentleman says he accepted as an example. I desire to premise that until the adoption of the new rules there was no rule except that of general good faith requiring the reference of bills to particular committees. Good faith demanded either such a title to the bill as should give notice of its character or such a reference as should carry it to the committee charged with the business to which it referred. These bills were submitted under the old rules, and there might in the absence of a specific rule have been excuse or apology if I had failed to send them to the right committee. But, sir, the new rules, not yet a month old, and in maturing which we spent so many weeks, I might say months, give a specific lawful direction to every bill. These rules are part of the law and members of this House are bound by the oath they have taken to submit to and maintain them.

Now what is in the very forefront of these rules, just adopted after so much deliberation?

RULE XI.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF COMMITTEES.

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, namely: Subjects relating—

1. To the election of members: to the Committee on Elections;
2. To the revenue and the bonded debt of the United States: to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Can language be plainer than this? Is there a school-boy of nine in any of our families who on reading that provision would not know that to refer a bill touching the revenues to any other committee than that on Ways and Means was a violation of the law of the land? And I apprehend the general legislative intelligence of the gentleman is quite equal to that of the general lads of the country of nine years of age. [Laughter.]

I have said these bills, Mr. Speaker, were introduced before the new rules were adopted; but let me add they were referred as the new rules require. No one complains of the title of the gentleman's bill as it stands alone; the complaint is against the title coupled with the fact that he referred it to a committee which he avers he knew under the rules it should not be sent to. There is the distinction between his bill and those I presented and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. Let me prove this. The bill of January 26 proposes that so much of section 3694 of the Revised Statutes as provides that the interest on bonds which have been or which may hereafter be held and which have been or may hereafter be canceled under the provisions of section 3695 of said statutes be repealed, &c. To what committee was it referred? To the Ways and Means—the committee charged with the consideration of the revenues and the bonded debt of the country. The bill of December 9 was also referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. And what are its provisions? That section 2981 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows: That whenever the proper officer of the customs shall be duly notified of a lien on freight, or imported goods, wares, or merchandise in his custody, he shall, before delivery of such goods, &c. Does not the text of these bills show my loyalty to the rules; the principles of the old and the text of the new? And how can any man having his wits about him plead them as a precedent for such a fraud as, in my opinion, is involved in the matter now under consideration?

Sir, if it be honorable for gentlemen to give a false designation to a bill, I mean to refer it to a committee from which its reference is prohibited by the rules of the House, we must, as matter of self-protection, have every bill read. The designation of a committee is a matter of honor and fidelity to the body of members as well as to the law. When a bill is sent to the Clerk's desk by a member of this House and its title is not given by reference to its provisions, the committee to which it is proposed to refer it is accepted on the honor of the proposer, which is pledged that his reference is to the committee to which the rules require it to go; and if that honorable pledge be violated, we will have to expand Monday into Tuesday, and possibly into Wednesday, in order to have all bills read at the desk to see whether any member is practicing artifice to get a bill to an inappropriate committee.

Now, sir, what was the bill of the gentleman? He says it was to give people cheap salt and cheap paper. Was it only this and nothing more? Its title declared it to be a bill to revise and amend sections 2503, 2504, and 2505 of the Revised Statutes. That was its title, and it carried with it jurisdiction over the entire tariff system. It confided to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws the work of revising and amending the tariff of the United States, interwoven as its provisions are with every industrial interest of the country, with the capital embarked in every species of productive industry, and with the wages of every laborer employed in any of its infinitely diversified branches.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman would not permit me to interrupt him, and what was sauce for a poor goose may be sauce for as sturdy a gander as he. [Laughter and applause.] I beg him to let me proceed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I wish to correct my friend, that is all. He misrepresents my bill.

Mr. KELLEY. I decline to yield.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman, but I wish to correct him.

Mr. KELLEY. I wanted to do that with you, and you would not permit me. I have quoted the title of your bill.

Here are the Revised Statutes. I find section 2503 on page 459, and I find section 2505, concluding near the foot of page 489, the bill included just thirty pages, in which provisions of a line or less than a line often contain the law under which some particular industry has adjusted itself to the trade of the country and the world. A more sweeping bill was never introduced on this floor than that of the gentleman, or one more vital to the poor people who use school books and who read cheap newspapers and toward whom the gentleman's pretended sympathies gush out in his remarks on this floor.

Now, sir, I affirm that the gentleman's bill went to promote the interests of three classes of people that are protected by agencies un-repealable by Congress and more potent than any statute can give.

First, newspapers. You can not have a New York paper printed in Belgium where the cheapest papers and types are to be had. It must be printed in New York, and you cannot have a paper in the small towns on our Western frontiers printed elsewhere than at home, where they can get the local news of the day and the current advertisements. Gentlemen engaged in this industry came to us to talk of paper.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NICHOLLS. My point of order is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no right to go into the discussion of the merits of the bill presented by the gentleman from Illinois, in making a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no right to discuss the merits of the bill.

Mr. FINLEY. If we are going to accept this compromise it had better be done at once, in order that we may proceed to the consideration of the appropriation bills.

Mr. KELLEY. I have only two other points on which I wish to speak. The gentleman spoke of bills having been referred by "mistake." Does he pretend that he referred this bill by mistake?

Mr. NICHOLLS. I insist upon my point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is going beyond the question of personal explanation.

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair made the same restriction on the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLEY. When I say "no, sir," I only submit respectfully that I am not going beyond what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois. He spoke of the Committee on Ways and Means, and I am simply responding.

The SPEAKER. That is not in controversy.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, sir, he assailed that committee. He charged it with indifference to the interests of the people. He charged it with smothering bills in the committee, while I am ready to stand here and affirm that no committee of this House is working more laboriously, more conscientiously, or more beneficently for the interests of the country.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. KELLEY. He spoke of that committee as being a graveyard for bills—

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to be discourteous—

Mr. KELLEY. I was simply proceeding to say in response to the remark of the gentleman from Illinois—

Mr. FINLEY. I do not desire to be discourteous, but the gentleman rose to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. KELLEY. I stated that I desired to answer the personal statements contained in the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINLEY. My point is this, that the gentleman rose to a question of personal privilege. Now, I claim that we are spending valuable time here and if we are going to settle this compromise matter let us do it at once in order that we may get to work.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope I will be allowed five minutes' time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. KELLEY. I only want five minutes. In view of the charge made by the gentleman from Illinois, that the Committee on Ways and Means is a graveyard for bills, he asked what, under these circumstances, was the question for him. I will answer the gentleman's question. The question for him was what does the rule which I have sworn to maintain require at my hands. That was the sole question before him, and when he answered that question in such a way as to permit him to violate a plain and peremptory rule he made what I trust may prove to be the gravest mistake of his life. He reached a conclusion, he said, which justified him in fearing that if he sent the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, as the law required, it might not be treated as he wished. Sir, no gentleman has the right to violate the law of the land. No gentleman has the right to put every member of this House on the watch as to the purpose and character of every bill he may introduce.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McMILLIN. I say this cannot be perverted into a channel for the castigation of any member.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not castigated him. He made an attempt to castigate me.

Mr. McMILLIN. I admit he has not done it, but the gentleman is attempting to do it. That cannot be done.

Mr. KELLEY. Is it manly to castigate an old man like me and not permit him to reply to the boy who attempted it?

Mr. McMILLIN. If the old man complains of any improper action on the part of boys the best way for him to resent it is to set them a good example.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you believe that if a man be fairly challenged to discussion, and his motives be assailed, as mine were, when the House was told that if I had been assured the bill did not touch pig-iron I would have been sweet and courteous—[laughter]—do you believe challenges of that kind are not to be responded to? Is it chivalry, is it honor, is it manhood to prevent a reply?

Mr. McMILLIN. Manhood! Mr. Speaker, [laughter and cries on the republican side of "Oh!"] manhood, sir, on this floor is the observance of its rules. [Applause and laughter on the republican side.]

Mr. KELLEY. So I say. I cry amen to that just remark. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. McMILLIN. In support of my point of order I wish to say when a gentleman rises to a personal explanation—

Mr. CONGER. I object to more than one gentleman attacking the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McMILLIN. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania obtains the floor for the purpose of making a personal explanation, he must confine himself to what has been said concerning him, and cannot go outside of that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a correct construction.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] himself whether he believes the suggestion that the fact that it did not touch pig-iron would have swayed my judgment was not something to be replied to—such a suggestion?

The SPEAKER. That is not the point of controversy.

Mr. KELLEY. It was an aspersion thrown on my character as a man.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will please to confine himself to the matter of personal explanation.

Mr. KELLEY. When I find, according to the view of the gentleman from Tennessee, that I may not reply to personal assaults, I am at a loss to know what is regarded as personal.

Mr. McMILLIN. I want to set myself right with the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Cries of "Regular order!"] There is no man in the world who would more reluctantly interpose to prevent any member on this floor from setting himself right before the country than I. That was not my purpose. But when the gentleman wandered from what pertained to himself, I made the point of order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD rose.

Mr. BLAND. I now desire to offer my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD.]

Mr. HERR. I rise to a question of personal privilege. I rise on account of a remark of the gentleman from Illinois in reply to a gentleman who is absent from the House, which did him great injustice. And I wish to say to the Chair also that I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois directly to some difficulties which I have in the matter to which he has referred and which I should like to hear explained.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What gentleman from Illinois does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. HERR. I refer to you, and to what you said of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. STARIN.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Mr. STARIN is here, and came to my desk a moment ago.

Mr. HERR. He was not here when the gentleman from Illinois attacked him. [Cries of "Regular order!" and "Give him ten minutes!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] is on the floor.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It is very obvious from the character of this debate that it is wandering very widely from the disposition which has been manifested on both sides of the House to remove from this House all further trouble growing out of this question. Therefore I renew my proposition that the three Journals now unapproved be approved, and that the House shall be brought directly to the resolution that the bill referred to be taken from the Committee on the Revision of the Laws and referred to the proper committee under the rules, the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLAND. I object to the consent being given which is asked by the gentleman from New York until I have my proposition read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to have the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri read?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I do.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the regular order, and ask for a vote on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BLAND. I object to any proposition being entertained until that is read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman's objection comes in after the question has been considered.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire to ask the Chair whether any gentleman on either side of the House objects to this proposition.

Mr. VALENTINE. I do.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the proposition is before the House by consent. Nobody objected to it on its being read.

Mr. CONGER. The proposition had never been sent to the Chair, and I submit that the Chair cannot make any such ruling. I stood here demanding the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Michigan in demanding the regular order to refer to seconding the demand for the previous question on the proposition of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONGER. Oh, that can only be by unanimous consent, of course. The Chair will not disagree with me as to that. I demand now the regular order, which is the question pending yesterday on the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE.]

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. As I understand the position of the matter, my proposition is before the House by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I deny that it is before the House by unanimous consent. It never has been sent to the Chair.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I call the previous question on the adoption of my resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the proposition was fully discussed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSHEND,] and subsequently, in a measure, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Illinois rose to a personal explanation and interrupted any opportunity of submitting the question of unanimous consent to the proposition of the gentleman from New York. I object. And, if the Chair pleases, if it is to be held that the mere statement of a proposition, without unanimous consent being asked from the Chair, implies consent, then hereafter we must all be on our guard to object the very moment a member presents a proposition.

The SPEAKER. The proposition was in the nature of a motion.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman required unanimous consent to make such a motion. It has not yet gone to the Chair.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from New York holds it in his hand yet.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I asked unanimous consent of the House to submit a proposition. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] yielded to me and the House permitted me to submit a proposition which has been discussed for two hours.

Mr. CONGER. If it be necessary to prevent the proposition being entertained, I object now.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It is too late.

Mr. CONGER. No, it is not too late.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I demand the previous question on the proposition which I have submitted.

Mr. CONGER. How can the previous question be demanded on one proposition, when the pending question is the demand of the previous question on another proposition?

Mr. McLANE. I ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] to allow me to call his attention—

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I will yield for a question, not for debate.

Mr. McLANE. I am not going to debate. Not asking a question, I want to say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] that I understood the proposition he offered was to be accepted by consent. I want to ask him to take the trouble to inquire whether the resolution now pending is not itself unanimously accepted. I appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] to know if he is not willing to close this matter by the adoption of the pending resolution?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Coupled with the condition contained in the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] that the Journals of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday stand approved.

Mr. McLANE. I have no objection to that. With the permission of the gentleman from New York I desire the attention of the House for one moment. The pending resolution is found on page 27 of today's RECORD. That resolution has already been declared to be a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. So declared by the House.

Mr. McLANE. Only by unanimous consent can anything now take its place. I submit to the gentleman from New York that the House is ready to adopt the pending resolution almost by unanimous consent; simply having the Journals of the proceedings of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday approved. Why should we again involve ourselves in a debate upon a so-called compromise?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] is separate and distinct from mine in very many respects. But be that as it may, I submit that this is the only way in which both sides of the House can maintain their positions and this House again resume its duties in the legislation of the country. I therefore demand the previous question on the adoption of my proposition.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that the House was proceeding to divide upon seconding the demand for the previous question upon a privileged proposition submitted by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE.] I object to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] as I have done from the beginning, and I demand the regular order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It is too late for the gentleman to object.

Mr. CONGER. Well, we will try whether there is any virtue in the rules of the House.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] says that the House was dividing on some question. I have heard no question stated from the Chair this morning.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. As nobody else seems to want to say anything just now, I would like to make a few remarks. [Laughter and cries of "Go on!"]

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I hope the Chair will state the question.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Am I recognized?

Mr. ATHERTON. On what subject do you propose to speak?

The SPEAKER. The point involved is whether the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] is before the House.

Mr. PAGE. How did it come before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed by consent.

Mr. PAGE. I know a dozen men on this side of the House who were ready to object to it.

Mr. CONGER. There has been no proposition submitted to the House by the Chair. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] rose in his place and said that he had a proposition for a compromise which he would make, and which he proposed to offer. He made some remarks about it before he read it; then he read it and made some remarks afterward; but he never sent it to the Chair, and the Chair has not submitted it to the House, nor has the Chair asked consent of the House. The Chair has already stated that it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] will allow my amendment I will not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the notes of the reporter to be read, so that the House may understand the condition of this proposition.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to add that while the gentleman was talking about his proposed resolution, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] asked leave to make some remarks, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] waited for his remarks. The moment the gentleman from New York renewed his proposition, I called for the regular order. Now, I submit that there cannot be before the House a proposition, merely because there has been an offer of a proposition of compromise, which requires unanimous consent before it is sent to the Chair, and before the Chair has asked the House for that unanimous consent. It cannot be that such a proceeding will preclude me or any other member from withholding his assent from a proposition which requires unanimous consent. There must not be, there cannot be, that kind of a catch upon the House. The proposed compromise of the gentleman from New York is worse than the other proposition, about which we have been disputing, if it can be so.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] demanded the previous question on a privileged proposition. While that demand was pending, other matters arose and have continued until the present time. The Chair at the time said that the pending question was the demand of the previous question upon the privileged proposition. Now, can any other proposition come in except by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. It is a question whether unanimous consent was granted or not.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say to the Chair that members around me heard me say here this morning that whenever that proposition came up, so that there could be objection to it, I should object. There are a dozen of men here who have been waiting for my objection; and I say to the Chair that I intended to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not going to take any "catch." The Chair is not familiar with the exact phrase which the gentleman used; but the Chair will not take any undue advantage.

Mr. CONGER. I do not refer to the Chair at all.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. When the House met this morning the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] rose to a point of order with reference to the reading of the Journal. I immediately asked the gentleman to yield to me that I might submit a compromise proposition to the House. The gentleman did so. My proposition was read. Opportunity was given to every gentleman on the other side of the House to object. No gentleman did object. On the contrary, several gentlemen on this side and one or two upon the other side assented to it. The gentleman from Illinois asked me to yield the floor.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman indicate any one on this side of the House who assented to it?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It is immaterial whether there were all or a few.

Mr. PAGE. Can the gentleman designate any one?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I yielded to the gentleman from Illinois by his personal request, he intimating to me that he intended to support the proposition.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Which I did.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. He went on to make a speech for which I am not responsible. [Laughter.] He was replied to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. Several other gentlemen interposed. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] himself rose and made some statement to the House, but did not object. The proposition was before the House for its consideration and for its discussion. It was discussed, and it could not have been discussed had any gentleman objected, or if it had not been properly before the House for determination. I therefore hold that after two hours' discussion of this proposition the House should be brought to a vote upon it, so that we may resume our legislative duties. I demand the previous question.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire to put to the Chair a parliamentary question.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. One gentleman rises to a parliamentary inquiry, and the other to a point of order. The Chair recognizes first the point of order, and will afterward entertain the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. CONGER. I have made a point of order and I ask the decision of the Chair upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then suspend all other recognitions.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that in furtherance of my point of order Rule IX be read by the Clerk.

Mr. FINLEY. As the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has discussed the point of order, I want to say one word in reply. This morning the House was in a condition to proceed with the transaction of business by a virtual compromise or settlement of our difficulties, which would have been satisfactory to all. Now, if the gentleman from Michigan desires to throw in a fire-brand and prevent the transaction of legislative business, the responsibility must rest on his head if for some time to come we should continue in the condition in which we have been for two days past.

Mr. CONGER. In furtherance of my point of order I desire to have read Rule IX declaring what are questions of privilege, and then I wish read clause 2 of Rule XVI.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has risen to a point of order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. But a point of order on something that is not before the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York say that his proposition is not before the House?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. As I understand, the point of order relates to the question of privilege that was presented by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE,] which is not now before the House. My proposition of compromise is before the House.

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition to which, as the Chair understands, the point of order relates and on which the gentleman from Michigan desires to speak.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I did not so understand.

Mr. CONGER. In support of my point of order, I submit in the first place that the House has decided the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] to be a question of privilege on the submission by the Chair to the House. This, then, is a question of privilege not only by the submission of it by the Chair to the House, but by the decision of the House itself. The gentleman from Maryland demanded the previous question upon it. Mr. Speaker, if you will look into the RECORD you will find that according to the repeated declaration of the Chair the pending question was on seconding the demand for the previous question. I refer to page 33 of the RECORD of this morning:

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Maryland to demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland demands the previous question. Mr. BLACKBURN. And pending that I move that the House do now adjourn.

Then follow various other motions. Further on, upon the same page, I read from the language of the Speaker:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] demands the previous question on his resolution. As many as are in favor of ordering the previous question will say "ay."

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois. I move that the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland be referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. I believe this is in order under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to commit. The question is on the demand for the previous question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that being the situation, Rule IX provides:

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively, its safety, dignity, and the integrity of its proceedings; second, the rights, reputation, and conduct of members individually in their representative capacity only; and shall have precedence of all other questions, except motions to fix the day to which the House shall adjourn, to adjourn, and for a recess.

Now, Rule XVI, clause 2, reads as follows:

When a motion has been made, the Speaker shall state it, or (if it be in writing) cause it to be read aloud by the Clerk before being debated, and it shall then be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

In regard to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, whatever the proposition was from that gentleman, Rule XVI, paragraph 2, says positively it shall be stated by the Speaker, or, if in writing, be read aloud by the Clerk, and the Speaker shall cause it to be read aloud before being adopted, and it shall then be in possession of the House. Now the gentleman claims because he spoke about it, because he read it, because he commented upon it, it was in possession of the House for members to object to it or not. My point of order is, under the rule we should go on and second the demand for the previous question, and nothing else is in order except by unanimous consent. I object to anything else being in order except the vote on the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the Clerk to read the discussion which occurred this morning when the gentleman from New York presented the proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLACKBURN. I rose for the purpose of making the point of order that I made yesterday, that under the first clause of Rule I the only business now in order is the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. If the gentleman will yield to me, I desire to submit a proposition to the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. During my experience in this House I have on more than one occasion, probably twenty times, seen the House involved in a difficulty similar to the present one; and I have also always seen, after each side has struggled for a certain period, the difficulty amicably adjusted and the transaction of the proper business of the House renewed. Now, in view of the experience of the past two days' sessions I think the time has arrived when the members of this House, as sensible men desirous of prosecuting their legislative labors, should pause and come to some amicable adjustment of this question. It is after all but a technical difficulty, a technical difficulty which of itself is probably of little practical importance as affecting any result, yet it appears to me one of great magnitude so far as it operates to delay the business of Congress.

I therefore submit this proposition to the House, to both sides of the House, because upon this question I state heresincerely and distinctly that I hold a position not entirely in accord with that of either side of the House. I think this matter is susceptible of amicable adjustment, by which both sides can maintain their rights and the House can retain its integrity and its dignity. My proposition is that the Journals of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday be now approved, and that immediately thereafter and without debate the House will proceed to vote upon the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 5265, and that said bill be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means."

It does appear to me that by the adoption of this proposition we will accomplish all that we can accomplish if we continue the proceedings of yesterday through the entire session of to-day. The Journals of the preceding days of this week will be approved, and the House will be brought to a direct vote upon the proposition as to what reference this bill shall have, the bill being remanded back to the House, and the House then voting upon its reference. It appears to me that gentlemen on neither side of the House can object to my proposition.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does that proposition carry with it the reservation of the right to a division of the question?

The SPEAKER. That would be regulated by the rules.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I suppose that under the rules there are two distinct propositions in the resolution: first, to discharge the committee, and secondly to make a different reference; but I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not embarrass the proposition by asking for any division whatever.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no disposition to embarrass that proposition or to delay the work of this House. The only point for which I and those with whom I have been acting have been struggling from the first was to protect the Journal of this House from alteration or mutilation. When that is secured, and the integrity of that Journal is guaranteed, I have no further fight to make. It is now simply a question whether the Journals of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday shall in their natural and regular order be approved and this proposition of the gentleman from New York be then voted upon immediately without debate, or whether the cart shall be put before the horse by first voting upon this resolution and then by an anomalous process going back and approving the Journals. This is a technicality upon which I do not propose to delay this House by any contest. I think the gentleman's proposition is eminently correct and fair, and I am entirely content with it. I speak only for myself, for I have no right to speak for anybody else.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. Will a two-thirds vote be necessary to carry the last proposition of the gentleman from New York?

The SPEAKER. This proposition, the Chair supposes, if adopted, is to be agreed to without dissent.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I understand that a majority vote will be all that will be necessary to carry the proposition.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois, obtained the floor.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me a moment, I wish to inquire whether the gentleman from New York will admit one amendment?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. I prefer not to yield now. Let me first get through what I have to say.

Mr. Speaker, I approve of the proposition offered by the gentleman from New York. I think it will bring about a satisfactory result—satisfactory at least to those gentlemen with whom I have been associated on this floor. I therefore hope that when the question comes before the House there will be no dilatory motion interposed, that there will be no further delay in reaching a final vote upon this question. I regard the proposition as eminently fair and proper.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. After that this discussion proceeded without any objection.

Mr. HAWLEY. I make a parliamentary inquiry. I do it with a view to a better understanding of the proposition of the gentleman from New York, and, I will say frankly, with a view of removing my own possible doubts in order to accept it. I am inclined to do it, but I wish to be satisfied on two points. The question of privilege was raised, the gentleman from Maryland claiming that when a Journal was read disclosing what in the opinion of the House was a gross error a correction of that upon the spot was a question of privilege, and the House so decided. Does that decision of the House remain untouched by this arrangement?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. By the terms of the proposition, I will say in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut, the Journal will stand of record as it did.

Mr. HAWLEY. My only question was whether any arrangement here would set that aside.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It touches none of the Journals. They are all to be approved.

Mr. HAWLEY. One other question. My question was addressed to the gentleman from New York as to his understanding of the proposition. I understand by his reply the Journals are to be considered and approved in the order of the days. Is that so?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Undoubtedly, although that is immaterial.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I arise, Mr. Speaker, to make a parliamentary inquiry, and I hope gentlemen will not interrupt me while I am making it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I desire some information from either the Speaker or the House, which I believe can only be had by a parliamentary inquiry. I hesitate, however, somewhat to make it, for I shall necessarily have to preface it with something of a speech, and I am afraid some high-tariff gentleman on one side or the other of the House will say I am trying to practice another fraud on the House, and then, according to the prevailing custom here, I should have to hold him personally responsible. [Laughter.] I cannot state my proposition in a single breath and I hope, therefore, that gentlemen will not grow impatient and hurry me too much, and that I shall not be interrupted by points of order. I am not seeking recognition by the Speaker for the purpose of making a speech under the guise of submitting a parliamentary inquiry, nor of raising a point of order as I have sometimes seen gentlemen do. I want light on this subject both for my own and the benefit of the House, for after three days of heated discussion participated in by most of the recognized orators and statesmen of this body [laughter] the matter under consideration has become more obscure than it was when we started.

It seems to me that the longer we discuss it the less we know about it. [Laughter.] At the commencement of the discussion a few of us who had done all the little listening that it was deemed necessary to do at all had some glimmering comprehension of the different intricate questions of parliamentary law involved, but now, so far as I can see, we are totally in the dark, and it is important, therefore, that we should be enlightened a little before we go any further. I must again ask gentlemen not to be impatient. I am not a very fast man, and will have to go slow. [Laughter.] I will make my preliminary remarks as brief as possible, state some propositions necessarily connected with it, and then propound my question. This discussion has already, in my judgment, been most needlessly and unreasonably protracted, and it is, I think, quite time it was ended, so that the public business may be proceeded with, in order that Congress may adjourn some time previous to the period fixed by law for its reassembling. The discussion has not only been too long and too angry, as I think, but has been useless and unprofitable, except in so far as it has established some facts that perhaps needed to be proven, though many of us, I think, had a pretty strong suspicion of their existence before. One of these facts, which it is quite evident has been very clearly demonstrated, is that all of the republican and a few of the democratic members of this House are opposed to any change in our present schedule of tariffs or system of supplying the revenues of the Government.

If it has heretofore been thought necessary by gentlemen in favor of tariff reform to keep up the contest in order to demonstrate this fact they can now very properly allow it to end, as there can be no longer any reasonable doubt upon that point. The line has been distinctly drawn, and we know precisely where every gentleman stands. It must be apparent by this time to the advocates of tariff reduction that no legislation can at present be had upon that subject, and that it is neither wise nor politic to continue the effort longer.

This discussion has served the further purpose of demonstrating most conclusively the marvelous ability of the committee which we charged with that duty, to construct a code of parliamentary laws for the government of this House. We gave them a summer's recreation at a fashionable watering-place for the purpose of revising and codifying the old rules, and as the product of their labors they have given us a system of rules that absolutely stops all legislation in one week after their adoption. [Laughter.] Saratoga does not seem to have been a favorable location for law-givers to perform their work. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. We were not at Saratoga at all.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Then you were somewhere else, and your work was badly done, wherever you were.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is not the fault of the rules, but of their wrong construction. The rules are right, and I defend them.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. My friend, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] says it is not the fault of the rules that we have gotten into this trouble, but of the wrong construction which has been given them. I tell him, however, that the fault is justly chargeable to both these things. It would, it seems to me, have been a very easy thing for gentlemen of such ability as those who compose the Committee on Rules to have given us a code so simple in their construction that the Speaker would not have been called upon to ask the aid of the House in their proper interpretation.

Everybody knows the consummate ability of our Speaker as an apt and ready expounder of parliamentary law, (for in that respect he has few, if any, superiors,) and that if the duty of construing the rules had been directly imposed upon him he could and would without hesitation have given them a correct interpretation. But instead of that being done, they have been presented to us in a form so uncertain and doubtful as to allow the Speaker to refer them to the House for a sort of legislative or, more properly speaking, political construction, instead of a judicial one, which he as the Speaker of the House should have put upon them himself, and then if everybody was not satisfied an appeal might have been had.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state—

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. I have a question which I desire to ask before concluding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to interpose a ruling on a point which was just submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] in the course of his remarks:

The Speaker may, in order to settle the future practice of the House under a certain state of circumstances, submit a question for its decision.—Congressional Globe, 1, 26, p. 226.

This is in accordance also with Cushing, from whose Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies the Chair submits the following extracts:

285. In Parliament, the presiding officer of the lords is the lord chancellor, who unless he is at the same time a peer of the realm, is not a member of the house, and has no right to speak or vote. In the commons, the presiding officer is always a member, who being duly elected to the office by the house, is denominated the speaker, in Latin, prolocutor. The appellation of speaker is probably derived from the principal function exercised by this important officer, in the earliest periods of parliamentary history, and perhaps at the time when the whole Parliament sat together. The chief business of the speaker originally was to express the will of the commons, and to speak for them, in all the proceedings of the Parliament in which they were allowed or required to participate; the ascertaining of what their will was being doubtless, at that period, attended with little or no difficulty, and therefore a very subordinate and unimportant branch of the speaker's duty. In modern times, though the speaker still remains in some sense the formal mouthpiece of the house, the duty of presiding over its deliberations and ascertaining its will has become the principal and much the most important of all his functions.

288. The functions of the speaker of the House of Commons are somewhat different from those of the lord chancellor, as presiding officer of the House of Commons. The latter, though he presides in a deliberative assembly, is invested with no more authority for the preservation of order than any other member; and, if not himself a member, his office is limited to the putting of questions and other formal proceedings. The lord chancellor, if he is not a peer, may address the house and participate in the debates as a member; but as his opinion is liable to be questioned like that of any other peer, he does not often speak to points of order. If a peer, he votes with the other members; if not, he does not vote at all. There is no casting vote in the lords; if the house is equally divided the motion fails, and a record thereof is accordingly made on the journal, with the words accompanying that in such cases, semper proæmitur pro negante.

290. The functions of the speaker of the House of Commons are thus summed up by a late English writer: "The duties of the speaker of the House of Commons are as various as they are important. He presides over the deliberations of the house, and enforces the observance of all rules for preserving order in its proceeding; he puts all questions and declares the determination of the house. As 'mouth of the house,' he communicates its resolutions to others, conveys its thanks, and expresses its censure, its reprimands, or its admonitions. He issues warrants to execute the orders of the house for the commitment of offenders, for the issue of writs, for the attendance of witnesses, for the bringing up of prisoners in custody, and, in short, for giving effect to all orders which require the sanction of a legal form. He is, in fact, the representative of the house itself, in its powers, its proceedings, and its dignity. When he enters and leaves the house, the mace is borne before him by the sergeant-at-arms; when he is in the chair, it is laid upon the table and at all other times when the mace is not in the house it is with the speaker and accompanies him upon all state occasions." The duties of the presiding officers of our legislative assemblies are substantially the same as here described.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. The House by a majority vote has construed two or three of these rules, but, as always happens when legislative bodies undertake to construe as well as to make laws, the construction was a wrong one. Everybody in this House knows that the second clause of the first rule imperatively requires the reading of the Journal of the preceding day every morning and that there is no warrant or authority in any subsequent rule for dispensing with it in the manner it has been done, yet a majority of the House decided that this requirement need not be complied with. Every lawyer in the House knows that the question of privilege presented by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] is an absurdity both in its theory and in the effect of its practical application, and yet the House sustained it. These were mere political and not judicial rulings.

An effort was made by my colleague [Mr. HOUSE] during the recent discussion upon the rules to supply by an amendment which he offered a defect which was even then clearly manifest to many gentlemen on this floor; but mainly by the efforts and influence of the Committee on Rules his purpose was defeated. Had that amendment been adopted, as it should have been, the three days consumed in this profitless discussion might have been devoted to needed legislation, and under its operations the question here presented could have been satisfactorily disposed of in five minutes.

I would not be surprised, Mr. Speaker, if the best disposition we could make of this entire matter would be to commit it all, along with the revised rules, to the Committee on Rules, with leave to take another trip to Long Branch next summer and see if they cannot by some means get into a straight line this tangled parliamentary thread, so that when we come back here next winter a bill can be referred to the proper committee without three days of discussion. [Laughter.] I think this course is the best we can pursue, unless there is some foundation for a rumor gaining credence in the House, and for a strong suspicion which is beginning to steal over my own mind, that these rules in their present shape are the result of a combination or conspiracy between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.] They are both accomplished and fascinating orators, and the House is always delighted to hear them. Now, people do say, and I do not know but that I have some such belief myself, that these two gentlemen gave us this system of vague, indefinite, and uncertain rules for the sole purpose of having an opportunity to discuss them, and the pleasure of instructing the House in their hidden mysteries; for certainly nobody else understands them, and even they differ in the construction which they give them.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question I desire to ask is this: if the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSEND] should be allowed to remain with the Committee on the Revision of the Laws and should be reported to the House for its favorable action, could it not upon a point of order be referred by the Speaker to any other committee?

The SPEAKER. It could not.

Mr. YOUNG, of Tennessee. Then I subside. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to make one further parliamentary inquiry. We are much nearer the end of this matter than my friend from Tennessee indicates. I would like to be satisfied on this point alone, and I think it will go far toward ending this discussion. Will a majority vote on the McLane—pardon me—proposition suffice?

Mr. CARLISLE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Connecticut that that proposition is all on one side. It does not approve the Journals of the House, which is the matter in controversy on this side.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will my colleague allow me?

The SPEAKER. The point of order is whether this proposition is or is not before the House.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. That is one question.

The SPEAKER. And when that is disposed of—

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not desire to delay the decision of the Chair at all, but in justice to the gentleman from Maryland and in response to the question of my colleague from Kentucky, I wish to say the gentleman from Maryland has accepted the suggestion to insert in his proposition the words "the Journals of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, in their order as made up, shall be read and approved."

Mr. CARLISLE. Of course I understand that the proposition is not pending before the House.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am not on the point of order now and do not desire to delay the decision of the Chair—

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state what he understands to be the present condition of this subject. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] was recognized on a point of order and immediately yielded to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] who offered a proposition which the gentleman from New York stated, and subsequently advocated. The gentleman from New York then yielded to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who made certain remarks personal in their character.

Mr. HAWLEY. Personal!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania replied, and thereafter, or at some time during these proceedings, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] asked the gentleman from New York if he would yield to an amendment to his proposition. The gentleman from New York replied that he would not yield to have it voted upon but that he would yield to have it read for information.

There is no record, as far as the Chair sees, of an objection during the proceedings to which the Chair has alluded; and the Chair stated in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] that a majority would carry the proposition, the Chair assuming that it was before the House. But the Chair never has yet deprived a member of a right which he alleged on his word that he meant to exercise by his objection; and the House will bear out the Chair in saying that he has over and over again said he would traverse any proceeding when a member rose in his place and said on his word that he meant to object. The Chair, therefore, in this instance, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] objecting, feels it obligatory on him to recognize that fact, and rules that the proposition of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] is not before the House.

Mr. McLANE. I beg to offer a modification of the pending proposition— [Cries of "Regular order!"] I have a parliamentary right to offer it, and it is one which I think will receive the consent of the House.

Mr. MILLS. What is the proposition?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not yet heard it.

Mr. CONGER. In order that there may be no question about questions which might be objected to under the rule being objected to, I ask that the Chair in submitting any proposition shall state if it is open to objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the gentleman wants to reserve his right to objection.

Mr. CONGER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair reserves the right of the gentleman.

Mr. McLANE. I send the modification I propose to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "resolved," in the resolution, insert "that the Journals of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday shall be read for approval in their order."

Mr. McLANE. It is suggested to me that Monday's Journal has been read. Let it read "of Tuesday and Wednesday."

Mr. GARFIELD. Let us now hear how it will all read if the resolution be thus modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House being of opinion that the reference of House bill No. 5265 to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was incorrect under its rules, doth Resolve, That the Journals of Tuesday and Wednesday shall be read for approval in their order, and that the said committee be discharged from its further consideration; and that the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MILLS. Now I desire to submit another amendment to the proposition, to add the following, to come in after the words "Committee on Ways and Means:"

With instructions to report the same back to this House.

Mr. BLAND. That is in substance the same as my amendment. I ask the gentleman from Maryland to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to inquire whether it is proposed that that resolution shall be adopted as a whole, or whether it is to be divided?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I had risen to make the same inquiry.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question should be called and sustained on the resolution of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE], the Chair would then decide the point whether it is susceptible of division under the rule. The Chair does not desire to answer that inquiry until the point arises.

Mr. CONGER. Then I desire to ask this further question—

Mr. McLANE. Mr. Speaker, the previous question has been demanded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to listen to anything that may conduce to a proper understanding.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman from Maryland can modify his resolution after the House has come to a decision upon the other proposition?

The SPEAKER. The House has not come to a decision upon the proposition. If the Chair correctly remembers—and he wants any one to correct him if he does not state correctly the matter as it occurred—the gentleman from Maryland, the House having decided it was a question of privilege, submitted his proposition. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] then moved to lay the resolution on the table. That was voted down. That threw the proposition open, and enabled the gentleman from Maryland to modify it.

Mr. CONGER. This is the question I desire to submit to the Chair, if the Chair will bear with me. The Chair submitted the former proposition of the gentleman from Maryland—different in words and language from this—to the House to decide whether that proposition as read involved the question of privilege. The House decided that the subject-matter was a question of privilege; but the House might want to change the phraseology of the resolution, and its decision that the subject-matter was a question of privilege would not debar it from doing that.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. There is one now pending. The Chair will hear the gentleman from North Carolina in a moment.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to make one further inquiry, and the answer to it may relieve me of all my embarrassment in the matter. Does this change in the language of the resolution have any effect on the decision of the House that this is a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. That is a matter of record and was before the House as a privileged question, and thus open to an amendment germane to the resolution. The Chair cannot overturn the vote of the House.

Mr. CONGER. Then I have no particular objection.

Mr. SPARKS. I suggest to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] that he amend the resolution by inserting "Monday;" otherwise the Journal of Monday would not be approved.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so; but the Chair thinks the Journal of Monday need not be read again. It might be as well to insert Monday in the resolution, although the Journal of that day need not be read again.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have that opportunity if the House votes down the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BLAND. I have been on the floor half a dozen times. Does the Chair recognize me?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman three times, and the gentleman has spoken as often.

Mr. BLAND. But always recognized somebody else before I could get through with my remarks. I desire to have read an amendment, and then to ask that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] yield for it to be considered as before the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman should have opportunity to have his amendment read.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be read in the hearing of the whole House, once for all.

Mr. MILLS. And we want it voted on.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the resolution the following:

And that the Committee on Ways and Means report back said bill, or a bill of the same import and substance, to the House within three weeks from this date.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. McLANE] yield for that amendment?

Mr. McLANE. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The question, then, is upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. McLANE moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The pending proposition will be read as it is now before the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House being of opinion that the reference of House bill No. 5265 to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was incorrect under its rules, doth Resolve, That the Journals of Tuesday and Wednesday shall be read for approval in their order, and that the said committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. That was amended by inserting "Monday."

The SPEAKER. Monday's Journal has been read but not approved.

Mr. GARFIELD. We will settle that question as soon as this passes.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a point of order, that the proposition is divisible, and I call for a division.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has already given notice that he will demand a division of the question.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. It was understood that "Monday" was to be inserted in the resolution.

The SPEAKER. That is not material. The Chair will state the operation of this: If this resolution shall be adopted, the first question will be on the approval of the Journal of Monday, which has already been read. The next question will be on the reading and approval of the Journal of Tuesday; next, on the reading and approval of the Journal of Wednesday; and next on the proposition to discharge the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and its reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is all right.

The resolution, as modified, was then adopted.

Mr. McLANE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on approving the Journal of Monday's proceedings, as read on Tuesday last.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the Journal of Monday be approved.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next business is the reading of the Journal of Tuesday.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journals of Tuesday and Wednesday be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that should not be done. The proceedings of the last two days show that such a proposition should not be agreed to. The Chair has always objected to dispensing with the reading of the Journal when proposed. It is the right of any member on the floor to object to dispensing with the reading of the Journal, and when no member asserts that right the Chair usually interposes his own objection.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday last; which, being read, was approved.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, (Wednesday.)

Mr. NICHOLLS. I am recorded as not voting yesterday on the first motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EWING] to adjourn. While none of my votes yesterday were in the line of filibustering, I did vote in the affirmative on that motion to adjourn, and I ask that the Journal be so corrected.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be amended as indicated.

The amendment of the Journal was agreed to, and the Journal as amended was approved.

Mr. MULBROW. I understand that under the rules pairs are to be announced at the conclusion of roll-calls. I was paired on yesterday after six o'clock with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. DWIGHT,] but neither the Journal nor the RECORD shows that there was such a pair.

The SPEAKER. The Journal does not record pairs.

Mr. MULBROW. The pair was handed in to the Clerk, and I ask that the correction be made in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The question now before the House is upon that portion of the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. Was not the resolution adopted as a whole?

The SPEAKER. It was, but it was distinctly understood that the effect of adopting it would be to require a vote on the proposition contained in the resolution to discharge the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and to refer to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CONGER. But I asked the Chair distinctly whether there would be a separate vote on the different parts of the resolution, and nobody demanded that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] and other gentlemen had made a demand for a division of the question.

Mr. CONGER. That should have been made on the parts as they came along.

The SPEAKER. Several gentlemen made the demand.

Mr. MCMAHON. The resolution was only adopted as a line of procedure.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, what did we vote on before?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House voted what should be its proceeding touching the subject in controversy; and the House is acting in pursuance of that; for the Journal of Monday has been approved, and the Journals of Tuesday and Wednesday read and approved.

Mr. CONGER. That had to be after the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Now the question is on the adoption of the resolution by subdivision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the questions are on the parts of the resolution offered by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE.]

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House—

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Let me ask whether this is the resolution which the House has adopted?

The SPEAKER. This is the resolution that the House adopted as a manner and mode of procedure touching the subject in controversy before the House.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Under the question of privilege of yesterday.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What is the question now before the House?

The SPEAKER. Whether the Committee on the Revision of the Laws shall be discharged. The resolution being divisible the vote will first be taken on the first division of the resolution, then on the second division of the resolution, then on the preamble, if a separate vote be desired on each.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House, being of opinion that the reference of House bill No. 5265 to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was incorrect under its rules, doth Resolve, That the Journals of Tuesday and Wednesday shall be read for approval in their order, and that the said committee be discharged from its further consideration and that the same be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. PAGE. Now, what was the vote?

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the record of the vote be read.

The SPEAKER. What record?

Mr. CONGER. The Journal.

Mr. CRAPO. Mr. Speaker, was that resolution adopted?

The SPEAKER. The resolution was adopted, but there was a distinct understanding that these questions should be voted on. The Chair thinks there can be no controversy about that.

Mr. CONGER. There is this controversy. I asked the Chair, the last thing before the vote, whether the resolution was to be divided?

The SPEAKER. And what did the Chair say in reply?

Mr. CONGER. The Chair said that when the question arose he would decide it.

The SPEAKER. That reply was not whether it was to be divided, but whether it was divisible, and the Chair declined to rule on the latter suggestion.

Mr. CONGER. No, sir. I asked whether the resolution was to be voted on in the separate divisions of it. The RECORD will show—

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows perfectly well what he said. He said he would decide the point of order whether the resolution was divisible when it arose.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the Journal may be read.

The SPEAKER. And that very statement looked to the submission of the resolution in all its parts to a further vote of the House. If the questions embraced in the resolution were not to be submitted, there was no occasion for the Chair to make that remark. Before this resolution was voted on the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DAVIS] suggested that the word "Monday" should be inserted in the resolution so as to cover the Journal of that day. In reply to that suggestion the Chair said:

The Chair will state the operation of this. If this resolution shall be adopted, the first question will be on the approval of the Journal of Monday, which has already been read. The next question will be on the reading and approval of the Journal of Tuesday; next on the reading and approval of the Journal of Wednesday; and next on the proposition to discharge the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, and then on the reference to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CONGER. Then, Mr. Speaker, what did we vote upon?

The SPEAKER. The House voted upon the resolution as a direction of procedure.

Mr. CONGER. And adopted it.

Mr. MCMAHON. In pursuance of the resolution the House has voted twice upon the question of approving the Journal.

The SPEAKER. Not only has the House voted twice, but, on motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. NICHOLLS,] one of the Journals has been amended.

Mr. CONGER. Of course we could not by the adoption of the resolution approve Journals which had not been read.

The SPEAKER. If the adoption of the resolution carried with it the approval of the Journals, why did the House subsequently without dispute vote on those questions? The adoption of the resolution did not carry with it the approval of the Journals, for those questions were to be voted on; then, to be consistent, the other questions involved, providing for the discharge of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws and reference to the Committee on Ways and Means, should be voted on.

Mr. CONGER. It said they should be read for approval, and the resolution was adopted, and then they were read for approval.

The SPEAKER. They were read and a vote taken on approval, and one of the Journals was amended on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CONGER. Of course; and will the Chair state to this House whether the resolution was adopted?

The SPEAKER. The resolution was adopted, as the Chair thinks, as a direction of procedure, and under that a vote was taken on the Journals in order of their date, and one of the Journals was amended, and the same consistency should require a vote on the latter branches of the resolution.

Mr. WHITE. May I ask—

The SPEAKER. In addition to the consistency of it, that was the absolute understanding in the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. That was the absolute understanding.

Mr. WHITE. May I ask the Chair by what right he says that resolution was passed as an order of procedure?

The SPEAKER. The right of judgment.

Mr. CLYMER. The Speaker expresses the whole judgment of the House.

Mr. WHITE. When I voted for that resolution I voted for it with the understanding the instant it was passed the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was discharged from the further consideration of the bill in dispute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not take away from the gentleman his right of construction.

Mr. WHITE. Very well, then.

The SPEAKER. But he does not agree that he must be ruled by that construction.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. And that is a good point.

Mr. WHITE. I insist the resolution admits of but one construction.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman make the point of order?

Mr. WHITE. I do raise the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair respectfully overrules it.

Mr. HERR. I asked distinctly whether this resolution was to be voted on in separate parts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair said it was to be.

Mr. HERR. There is no doubt about it. Now let us have straight, square, fair play.

Mr. CLYMER. That is right.

Mr. HERR. Let us have it right through.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think I understand what led to this conclusion. The proposition of the gentleman from New York, a copy of which I have—

The SPEAKER. That proposition was ruled out.

Mr. GARFIELD. It said distinctly that the Journals of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday be read and approved, and that immediately thereafter and without debate the House proceed to vote upon the following resolution about discharging one committee and reference to another. Now, that was the proposition of the gentleman from

New York. In strict terms, literally, the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland, which was adopted, does accomplish the whole thing, but I think the House generally, or a good many of them, had in their minds it was like the same proposition the gentleman from New York had offered, and they expected a vote. And, in view of that expectation, I think they ought to have it. I am not willing to take any advantage of technicality, and, therefore, I think we ought to have a vote.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not mean to criticize but, on the contrary, to commend the fair suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio. But I desire, Mr. Speaker, to protect some members of this House from the implied imputation of having been misled or having made a blunder. They have not done it. I will not undertake to cavil about the technical construction to be given to the motion on which the House voted; but I appeal to the record. On that we must all stand at last to vindicate the view which the Chair has just taken as to the status of this matter. Not only was it understood by the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Ohio and myself and the Chair that this was simply to determine the mode or method of procedure, but I did, sir, demand on yesterday and renewed that demand to-day, and the record shows both, that there should be a division of the question into three parts.

The SPEAKER. The record shows that was your demand on yesterday.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir; and that demand of mine for a separate vote on the three subdivisions is pending this instant before this House. There never would have been consent given except on that condition. The gentleman from Ohio is right on the broad, square equities. There is no dispute of that, and can be none among gentlemen; but on the sharpest technical construction that can be given I have the right to demand on the record the three separate subdivisions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will indicate the divisions.

Mr. GARFIELD. Technically he has not, but equitably he has.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I say further that the Chair has ruled correctly that the vote upon the preamble is to be taken last. That is regulated by the rule.

The SPEAKER. That is the practice.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The rule and the practice determine it.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that whatever the understanding—[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] Gentlemen have not often seen me get down by that kind of proceeding. [Laughter.] The gentlemen spoke of what the understanding on that side of the House was. I warned my friends here, and I addressed the Chair, so that we should know positively whether that demand for a division went into this resolution and whether it was pending; and, if so, it should have been put on as a part of the resolution itself when the resolution was before the House, and before it was passed.

But it was not demanded, and the resolution was passed as a whole.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Maryland was pending, as the RECORD of yesterday will show, and a division was demanded thereon.

Mr. CONGER. Then the vote should have been taken on the parts of the resolution while it was pending, and not after it has been passed and disposed of. No gentleman on this side of the House, I venture to say, thought that that resolution could do anything else than what appears on its face—namely, that the bill was improperly referred, and to discharge the committee from the consideration of it and place it in the hands of the Committee on Ways and Means, where it belongs. Now there is no dispute here but what it is a "horse." The only question is whether it is a Trojan horse or not, and we find it to be a Trojan horse. I warned my friends here on this side that there was something concealed in this proceeding which they did not anticipate, and I asked the Chair if we were to vote on the proposition as a whole, or if it was to be divided. The Chair decided that he would determine that question when it arose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is hardly fair for the gentleman to tack his mistake on to the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. If there was to be a separate vote the Chair should then have announced it to the House before we voted and adopted the resolution as an entirety. Now, my friends on this side of the House may see how easily they can be misled and how innocent they are. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair protests against that character of remark, so far as he is involved.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish to contribute to a settlement of this if I can. I do not desire to see any ill feeling. The moment it passed, finding some republicans were going off to get their lunch I warned them that there was to be a subsequent vote. I went to the cloak-room and the door but a dozen men had gone off and lost their vote, for the important vote was to come up. Then I struck men who had the other understanding—I cannot name them—but they were the leading men of the House who thought the whole thing was settled. Now, obviously, on the face of the gentleman's resolution there is a complete and final settlement of it, but a large portion of the House had the best reason in the world not to understand it in that way. Now, I say, let us have a vote.

Mr. BLACKBURN. That is right. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. PRICE. Let me say a word on this subject. I do not propose to be classed among the grammarians and linguists of the House, but the Chair will observe and the House will observe that the language of that resolution covers two points and only two. First, that the Journal shall be read for approval, which has been done, and next whether that bill shall go from one committee to another. Both of these things are in the resolution just as strong and as plain as the English language can make them. When I voted for that resolution I concluded that was a settlement of the whole question. We have read the Journal for approval, and we have passed the resolution, and I think that is the end of it.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the resolution—Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Let the first branch of the resolution to be voted on be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Laws be discharged from the further consideration of the bill H. R. No. 5265.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 143, nays 100, not voting 49; as follows:

So the portion of the resolution discharging the Committee on the Revision of the Laws from the further consideration of the bill was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. ROBESON said: I am paired with Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I believe if he were here he would vote "ay" with me, but in his absence I prefer to let the pair stand without voting.

Mr. BLISS, (who had voted "ay.") I withdraw my vote, being paired with Mr. DICK, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. UPSON. I listened for the calling of my name, but did not hear it. I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's name has been called twice.

Mr. UPSON. I was listening to hear my name called, and not hearing it I rose and asked the Chair if my name had been called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the gentleman. He thinks, under the circumstances stated, the gentleman should have the right to vote.

Mr. FISHER. I object; because the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] last night, under similar circumstances, did not hear his name called and was not allowed the privilege of voting.

The SPEAKER. The statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. UPSON] is that in the confusion he did not hear his name called, and that after the next name had been called he rose and asked if his name had been called. The Chair thinks the gentleman rose at the proper time to maintain his right, and the Chair recognizes his right to vote. This is not done by unanimous consent.

Mr. PAGE. Last night I desired to have my name called, but the Chair refused.

The SPEAKER. The Chair refused because the gentleman from California asked unanimous consent to vote, which the rule prohibits.

Mr. PAGE. I think not; but I have no objection to the vote of the gentleman from Texas being recorded.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, by inadvertence the Clerk called the name of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. UPSON] before mine, instead of in the usual order. The Clerk recalled the error and afterward again called the name of the gentleman from Texas. It was doubtless by this change in the regular order of the names that the mistake was made.

The SPEAKER. How does the gentleman from Texas vote?

Mr. UPSON. I vote "no."

Mr. DIBRELL. I ask that the latter portion of clause 7 of Rule XIV be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

During the session of the House no member shall wear his hat or remain by the Clerk's desk during the call of the roll or the counting of ballots, or smoke upon the floor of the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are charged with the strict enforcement of this clause.

The SPEAKER. The officers of the House, the Doorkeeper and Sergeant-at-Arms, will see to the enforcement of this rule.

Mr. DIBRELL. In having the rule read I had reference more particularly to gentlemen going to the Clerk's desk during the roll-call.

Mr. AIKEN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. AIKEN. It is whether any gentleman has the right during any roll-call to stand in front of the Chair and announce the fact that he is paired.

The SPEAKER. He has not.

Mr. AIKEN. That has been permitted more than once during this roll-call.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Mr. WHITTHORNE with Mr. KETCHAM.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Ohio, with Mr. EVINS.

Mr. FORT with Mr. O'BRIEN.

Mr. MORTON with Mr. COX.

Mr. DICK with Mr. BLISS.

Mr. MARTIN, of North Carolina, with Mr. SCALES.

Mr. KILLINGER with Mr. KIMMEL.

Mr. MARTIN, of West Virginia, with Mr. ACKLEN.

Mr. BEALE with Mr. YOCUM on all questions for this day.

Mr. HENKLE with Mr. URNER for to-day.

Mr. ROBINSON with Mr. KNOTT. Mr. ROBINSON would vote "ay" and Mr. KNOTT would vote "no."

Mr. HUNTON with Mr. REED on all questions during March 25 except where it is necessary to vote to make a quorum.

Mr. ROBESON with Mr. WILSON for to-day.

Mr. VALENTINE with Mr. PERSONS.

Mr. MILLER with Mr. MULLER until Monday.

Mr. LORING with Mr. BRAGG.

Mr. MONEY with Mr. OVERTON.

Mr. DUNN with Mr. SAPP until April 10 on all political questions on which the democratic and republican parties shall be opposed, the pair not operating to prevent a quorum.

Mr. KEIFER with Mr. CLARK, of New Jersey, on all political questions until Friday of next week.

Mr. SMITH, of Georgia, with Mr. WILBER, from the 24th instant, for eight days, on all questions of finance, politics, and the tariff, reserving the right to vote to make a quorum.

Mr. SHERWIN with Mr. WRIGHT for two weeks.

Mr. COVERT with Mr. HAMMOND, of New York.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Illinois, with Mr. MILES on all political questions except to make a quorum, from the 20th instant, during the leave of absence granted to Mr. MILES.

Mr. NICHOLLS. My colleague, Mr. PERSONS, is absent on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. NEW. My colleague, Mr. HOSTETLER, is sick and unable to attend.

Mr. WRIGHT. It has been announced that I am paired with Mr. SHERWIN. We happen to agree on this question, and I have voted "ay."

Mr. HAWK. My colleague, Mr. SHERWIN, is absent sick at his room. A gentleman just now informs me that a dispatch has been received from Mr. SHERWIN, and that he has gone to his own home.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the next part of the resolution, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that the said bill (H. R. No. 5265) be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. GARFIELD. The vote on the preamble will come last?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the House now refuses to commit this bill to the Committee on Ways and Means, what will be its status?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say that "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. WARNER. Suppose the motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Ways and Means is lost; is the bill then before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will answer any question when it arises, but not before.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 90, not voted 60; as follows:

So the second portion of the resolution was adopted.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. PHILIPS with Mr. PAGE.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon agreeing to the preamble of the resolution, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House being of opinion that the reference of House bill No. 5265 to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws was incorrect under its rules.

Mr. KENNA. Mr. Speaker, as a number of members have voted on the question of changing this reference on account of their convictions of what the rules of the House require, I ask for the yeas and nays on the preamble in order that the record may be complete.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 82, not voting 70; as follows:

Mr. RYAN, of Kansas, with Mr. ELLIS.

Mr. McLANE moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The bill in controversy will now go to the Committee on Ways and Means under the instructions of the House.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow being Good Friday, a day regarded by a good many people all over the world as one of peculiar solemnity, I therefore move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Saturday next at twelve o'clock.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ROBESON. If the gentleman from Delaware will make it Monday, perhaps it will carry.

Mr. MARTIN, of Delaware. Very well, then, I will move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was disagreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. BURCH, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the resolution of the Senate providing for the printing of 3,000 sets of five volumes each of the reports of the United States Fish Commission. The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 235) granting an increase of pension to Egbert Olcott;

An act (S. No. 1404) to provide for issuing patents for public lands claimed under the pre-emption and homestead laws, in cases where the claimants have become insane;

An act (S. No. 1282) to incorporate the National Educational Association;

An act (S. No. 1148) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue twenty-year 5 per cent. bonds of the District of Columbia to redeem certain funded indebtedness of said District," approved June 10, 1879;

An act (S. No. 1075) to authorize Dr. Daniel M. Appel, of the United States Army, to receive pay for discharging the duties of physician to the Mescalero Apache Indian agency, New Mexico;

An act (S. No. 1072) granting a pension to Arthur W. Irving; and

An act (S. No. 985) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary Leggett.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 3559) for the relief of L. H. Hersfield & Brother; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 68) to authorize the printing of 13,000 copies of the Report on Sheep Husbandry.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

An act (H. R. No. 2518) for the relief of Nelson Lyon and Jeremiah S. James.

CENSUS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I ask, Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent to submit a report from the Committee on the Census.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised it is an important matter which should be reported and acted upon immediately.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I desire to present this privileged report and demand the previous question.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. I shall object, unless the amendments are printed.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. No; the amendment strikes out certain sections of the Senate bill.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Then I object.

STAR POSTAL SERVICE.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Committee on Appropriations, by way of partial report, submit, for the purpose of having printed for the use of the House, all the testimony which has been taken by the subcommittee charged with inquiring into the cause of the deficiency in the star postal service.

Mr. CALKINS. Let me ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether the committee has yet closed its labors on that subject?

Mr. BLACKBURN. It has not; but in order that the House may inform itself of the question which will be presented by the amendments of the Senate to the House bill making appropriation to supply the deficiency for that service, it is proposed to have the testimony taken by that committee in the possession of members in print.

The SPEAKER. The committee has the right to report at any time. Mr. BLACKBURN. This is a report in part. It is as the Chair states; the committee have the right to report at any time.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he supposes it is fair and right the testimony should be published for the use and action of the House when the investigation is still unfinished?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman, and say that the Committee on Appropriations simply desire to take no advantage of the House. This testimony is already in print; it is in print, however, for the use of the committee. There are only a few copies. If the House does not want to have it printed for its own use and information, the Committee on Appropriations is entirely content.

Mr. CONGER. Is that all of the testimony?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes; all of the testimony taken up to this time.

Mr. CONGER. Has all the testimony on the subject been taken?

Mr. BLACKBURN. No; the committee has no idea of stopping the testimony. If the House wants all the testimony which has been taken, now in print for its own use, that is the proposition made by the committee. If it does not, the Committee on Appropriations will be entirely content, for it has the testimony already in print for its own use.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to say that while I have no objection to the testimony being printed, still at this time it is not exactly right to the parties under investigation to have the testimony printed and acted on by the House before that investigation has been completed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say that testimony is mostly of those who are being investigated.

Mr. CALKINS. I do not hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLOUNT. Nearly all the testimony which has been taken so far is that of the parties who are being investigated and complaining. So, therefore, no injustice is done to them.

Mr. CALKINS. What is complained of is that the House should be called upon to act on testimony which is incomplete and where the parties have not been fully heard.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask for a vote on my motion to print the testimony.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 1229) to authorize and direct the Commissioner of Agriculture to attend, in person or by deputy, the international sheep and wool show, to be held in the Centennial buildings, Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, in September, A. D. 1880, and to make a full and complete report of the same, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 5258) appropriating money to provide for the public printing.

To Mr. LORING, for ten days;

To Mr. EINSTEIN, for ten days, on account of important business;

To Mr. WRIGHT, for two weeks from Monday; and

To Mr. PERSONS, for to-day.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The Clerk read the following:

Mr. STONE asks leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Enos Johnson; Mr. WADDILL in the case of Samuel M. Pharris; and Mr. DE LA MATYR in the case of Charles O. Wood.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to state that I had intended to call up the contested-election case of Curtin against Yocum on Tuesday last, but owing to the condition in which business has been for the last two days I was unable to do so. I wish to give notice now that I will call up that case on Tuesday next after the morning hour.

Mr. ATKINS. I presume that will be a question of consideration.

DES MOINES RIVER LANDS, IOWA.

Mr. CONVERSE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1067) to quiet titles of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, in the State of Iowa, and for other purposes; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed, and placed on the House Calendar.

And then, on motion of Mr. O'NEILL, (at four o'clock and forty-two minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 26, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. SAMUEL DOMER, pastor of Saint Paul's English Lutheran church, Washington, D. C.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SATURDAY SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow's session may be set aside for debate on the funding bill—no question to be taken.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I object until we get through with the appropriation bill now pending.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I move now to dispense with the morning hour, with a view to proceed with the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill in Committee of the Whole.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 25.

Mr. BRIGHT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, and Mr. BRIGHT were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 30.

Mr. BRIGHT. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. BUCKNER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 121, nays 81, not voting 90; as follows:

Mr. HOSTETLER with Mr. HORR.

Mr. PAGE with Mr. WILLIS.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BRIGHT. I call for the regular order.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. ROBERTSON. It appears from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] propounded yesterday the following parliamentary inquiry:

If the bill offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSEND] should be allowed to remain with the Committee on the Revision of the Laws and should be reported to the House for its favorable action, could it not upon a point of order be referred by the Speaker to any other committee?

The following appears as the answer of the Chair:

The SPEAKER. It could not.

I did not at the time hear the answer of the Chair to that parliamentary inquiry. Had I done so I would have voted in an entirely different way from what I did. I was under the impression that under the rules should the Committee on the Revision of the Laws bring back this bill with a favorable report, a motion to discharge the committee or to recommit to another committee would have been in order. In order to avoid further controversy over this matter I voted as I did. Had I known, however, that that committee bringing in that bill with a favorable report, a motion to recommit to another committee would have been out of order, or that the bill would have been under consideration in this House, I would have been very far from voting as I did. For if a favorable report from that committee would have brought up the question of reducing the tariff as proposed in that bill I would have voted for the bill, because I am not a protectionist. I do not desire to be considered in that category; and I would have voted "no" instead of "ay" on the proposition of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. McLANE.]

Mr. McLANE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Louisiana by what right he gives any such significance to that vote?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I give it that significance because I was under the impression that—

Mr. SCALES. I rise to a question of order. All this is out of order. Mr. McLANE. I for one utterly repel the idea of there having been any such significance in the vote.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I concur with the gentleman from Maryland in denying that it had any such significance.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I speak merely for myself, and beg leave to differ in opinion from the gentlemen.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. SCALES. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina to delay making that report for the present. His proposition relates to public business, and the House has refused to dispense with the morning hour for private business. The Chair will recognize the gentleman hereafter.

The morning hour begins at thirteen minutes to one o'clock; and this being Friday, the morning hour of to-day is for reports from committees of a private nature. There comes over in this morning hour a bill undisposed of under the old rules. The Chair will cause the title of the bill to be read.

WILLIAM G. BUDLONG.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 2030) for the relief of William G. Budlong.

Mr. CONGER. Is that bill on the Calendar anywhere?

The SPEAKER. It is pending in the morning hour under the old rule.

Mr. KNOTT. I make the point that the old rules have no existence now. If it is held that this bill is pending under the old rule, then we would be proceeding under two sets of rules, although one set has been expressly abrogated by the adoption of the other.

The SPEAKER. This is a bill in the morning hour, reported before the new rules were adopted. It was being considered in the morning hour; and the Chair is unaware how any other status can be given to the bill under the circumstances except by disposing of it.

Mr. KNOTT. If under the new rules—

The SPEAKER. And the House has already adopted that course in regard to a bill of a public character, which was in the morning hour of a day other than Friday. This is in exact harmony with the action of the House on that occasion.

Mr. KNOTT. I appeal to the rules of the House—not to what the House may have done, whether right or wrong. If the rules provide that the bill now before the House shall go to one of the Calendars, it should go there, so that the morning hour of to-day shall not be occupied by its consideration. We are not acting under the old rules of the House, because they have been abrogated.

The SPEAKER. We are not acting under the old rules. This bill is actually in the morning hour undisposed of.

Mr. KNOTT. And being in the morning hour, it must go to a Calendar under the new rules.

The SPEAKER. It came in as a bill reported in the morning hour for consideration under the old rules, and was considered for thirty minutes or more. The Chair will cause to be read the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and adopted by the House in reference to the business of the House under the new rules. The Chair thinks that resolution will cover this question.

Mr. VANCE. This bill was already reported and had been considered in the morning hour before the new rules were adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that fact; that the bill was reported and was considered for some length of time. The Chair, however, will be influenced by the resolution which was adopted by the House on motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the foregoing rules, just adopted as a substitute for all existing rules of the House, shall take effect and be in force from and after the hour of noon on Monday next, on which day, after the reading of the Journal, the Speaker shall present to the House the calendars provided for in these rules, on which shall be entered in proper order all the measures now pending before the House or the Committee of the Whole: Provided, That in carrying these rules into effect no standing committee shall be abolished, nor the number of the same decreased, during the present Congress; nor shall any existing special order be set aside.

Mr. KNOTT. I submit that this is not a special order, and the resolution just read has no pertinence at all to the point I make.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is at a loss to know where the bill should go. It is certainly in the morning hour now.

Mr. KNOTT. It evidently should go to the appropriate calendar; if a private bill it should go to the Private Calendar, and if a public bill it should go to the Public Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That applies to reports of committees made after the new rules were adopted.

Mr. KNOTT. I respectfully call the attention of the Speaker to the language of the resolution just read, which requires the Speaker to cause calendars to be prepared in accordance with the new rules, upon which are to be bills, &c., according to their character.

The SPEAKER. This is unfinished business in the morning hour coming over from a former Friday. The Calendar has been made up in the manner set forth in the rules under the order of the House. This bill remains in the morning hour of Friday as unfinished business.

Mr. KNOTT. I understand that; but I maintain that the resolution which has just been read provides that the Speaker of the House shall have calendars prepared upon which shall be placed bills classified according to their character. If the Calendar has not been made in accordance with the direction of the resolution, then it has been made up erroneously and should be corrected.

The SPEAKER. It has not been made up erroneously, because this bill was reported from a committee and was under consideration in the morning hour of a Friday, before the calendars were ordered to be made under the new rules.

Mr. BLAND. Has not this bill been considered since the adoption of the new rules?

The SPEAKER. It has not been; but the House has considered a public bill pending in the morning hour of a day other than Friday and coming over under like circumstances. The Chair thinks that the action of the House in that case should influence him as to this case.

Mr. VANCE. This bill was reported, considered in the morning hour of a Friday, and when the morning hour expired it went over to the next private bill day, to come up in the morning hour, with the distinct understanding that the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU] should be entitled to the floor upon it.

The SPEAKER. That was the understanding in the House.

Mr. BREWER. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU] is on the floor. Does he yield for that motion?

Mr. BALLOU. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the action of the House on a public bill in the morning hour of a day other than Friday was in exact accord with the proposed proceeding upon a private bill in this morning hour.

Mr. KNOTT. The point of order, as I understand it, was not made in that case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that this bill has no other status than that of a bill under consideration in the morning hour. The Chair knows of no authority by which he can take this bill out of the morning hour and order it to be placed upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH, of Rhode Island. Cannot an arrangement be made by unanimous consent that this bill shall be considered to-day immediately after the morning hour?

Mr. BALLOU. Mr. Speaker, I believe I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to call the attention of the Chair and of the House to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in order to show that a bill has been placed on that calendar which should not be there, but which should be on another calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not want to have that matter interposed here during the morning hour. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] at another time for that purpose. The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU] is entitled to the floor on the pending bill and will proceed.

Mr. BALLOU. Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that the bill No. 2030, with report, for the relief of William G. Budlong, was taken up and read on Friday, March 5, and further consideration prevented by the expiration of the morning hour, since which time private-bill day has been superseded by other business. With the feeling which exists against the extension of patent rights, both here and elsewhere, a few words of explanation may be necessary in relation to this bill for the relief of Mr. Budlong, and why it should be recommended by the committee. The fact that petitions are received and referred to a committee for relief presupposes that there may be some cases entitled to a favorable consideration, so far at least as to present their claims to the Commissioner of Patents for his decision, even though the general rule be adverse, and thus ascertain by the testimony of those interested whether a reasonable remuneration has been received for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed, with a just regard always to the public interest. If there are no such cases, then it seems like an imposition upon the committee, and a mockery to applicants, to keep up the form of adjudication upon evidence and just principles at so great an expense of money and waste of time, when the whole matter is prejudged and without chance of repeal or change.

I cannot think the opposition to extension arises from any disposition to be unjust to inventors or to underestimate their labors, but rather from the impositions of sharpers and speculators and dealers in patent-rights whose inventive powers consist only in extorting money from innocent purchasers of patented articles. Against all such let there be the most stringent laws. But the real inventor who is entitled to a patent is a public benefactor and should be protected and encouraged. Very few such obtain any adequate compensation for the sacrifices they make and the benefits they confer. All the improvements in the arts, all the comforts and luxuries of life which we possess over the preceding generations we owe to inventors. The laborer that once toiled from morning till night, for the little which his own hands could do, can now sit in his chair and watch the machine that will accomplish for him ten times as much, improved in quality almost as much as in amount; and the farmer can now plow and sow and reap and mow without other fatigue or labor than guiding his horses from the easy seat of the carriage created by the inventor. The poor enjoy to-day luxuries which monarchs could not purchase fifty years ago, and the world grows rich and is blessed by the inventive genius of man. Let us be careful to discriminate between the mere speculator in patent rights who lives upon others' labor and the ingenious inventor who labors that others may live. The relief which is asked in this bill is for the latter and not the former, for an enterprising mechanic, an ingenious inventor, who has given years of time and all his surplus earnings after supporting his family, taking portions of the night as well as leisure hours in perfecting a machine which would save human labor and be a blessing to the community by making a necessary article in common use cheaper and better for all. But it takes time and money to introduce even a good thing to the knowledge and appreciation of the world, two things, unfortunately, which Mr. Budlong had not to spare, and the death of a friend, who was ready to assist him, and the change of the material used, to which the patent was first adapted, from wood to metal, (rendering a reissue with more perfect specifications necessary,) and the general depression of business, have thus far prevented him from so introducing it as to receive any pecuniary benefit, and without extension the fruits of his years of toil and sacrifice and expense will pass to other hands without any personal remuneration to himself.

Mr. Budlong has perfected his machine, which is all his own, and now for the first time that he is able by the aid of friends to introduce it to the public, he finds his patent is about to expire. The committee therefore, believing that this is in some respects an exceptional case, and that it is eminently just and right that the inventor should have an opportunity to present his case to the Commissioner, and thus possibly to obtain some reward for his labors, commend the passage of this bill to the favorable consideration of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] for ten minutes.

Mr. SMITH, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Patent Committee, I beg to offer a few remarks on this case. No man has more sympathy with inventors than myself. American mechanics and inventors have done more since my remembrance to bring the world from the old ruts and sloughs of pernicious habits or modes of doing business than had been in any other five hundred years of the world's history of which I have any knowledge. I will not detain you by attempting to enumerate the many improvements and discoveries, revolutionizing the old modes of doing business and adding so much to our comforts. We cannot do too much for inventors. We cannot do too much to encourage them to go on with the great work so well started. We must not for one moment imagine we are doing making improvements. The unseen, unknown future has an endless amount and variety of improvements calling loudly to us for an introduction to our people and our world. Let us withhold no encouragement from those who are willing to enlist in the great work of bringing them out. This business of extending patents by act of Congress is not for the interest of inventors, but directly opposed to them. I have never known an extended patent by act of Congress that did not overlay or interfere with some other inventor's device or improvements, thereby robbing him of the just fruits of his toil and labor. These extended patents usually find their way into the hands of speculators.

The paper-pulp extension is an illustration, monopolized by a few wealthy manufacturers, who oblige the poor printer and publisher to pay about three cents per pound extra for his paper, and it is wonderful to see how tamely the newspapers submit to that great fraud. The sewing-machine is another illustration. The patent eye-pointed needle monopolized the sewing-machine in this country twenty-eight years, though there were many hundreds of patented improvements made during the first half of the life-time of this unjust monopoly. Some of them were very essential to the eye-point patent, and in fact it could never have been a success without them. Still the eye-point patent held them all in abeyance, thereby robbing these inventors of their just rights to it. For twenty-five years the poor seamstress was compelled to pay about $40 dollars more for her machine than she would have done but for this monopoly, but it made a batch of millionaires and only robbed a few million poor sewing girls and a few hundred honest inventors. I could mention many others, but the history of one of these swindles is the history of all of them. The object of patent laws was to advance, to promote the arts, and not to retard or put back.

The result of these extensions by act of Congress has been to retard the arts every time, everywhere, and can have no other effect. I oppose this extension for the very reason that it is antagonistic to the interest of inventors and a gross wrong to the masses of the people. If my position be erroneous I hope gentlemen of more experience and knowledge upon this subject will correct me.

It was well understood by inventors who took out patents under the seventeen-year law that seventeen years was to be the entire life-time of their patent. They did their work knowing what they were to receive for it when the contract would expire, the bond be over.

It is all wrong, and not in accordance with our institutions, to allow anybody to monopolize any device or invention for a great length of time. We are a fast people; ours is a fast country. We cannot afford to give up a patentable invention to any man or body of men for one quarter of a century. I have taken out many patents myself and consider seventeen years long enough for me; and I even think that fifteen years would be better. Real inventors only require a chance to ply their vocation.

From all the information I can get in regard to this case it is like this: This man invented a machine for pegging boots and shoes and driving wooden pegs. This machine proved worthless. It was probably found that some part of this machine could be made to cover some ground occupied by a later inventor who had brought out a useful machine. Grant this extension and you rob him of his just rights and damage the public by withholding superior machines from the market.

We must take away these extended devices; we must give the inventors of our country a clear, open track, and you will see in the next fifty years improvements far eclipsing anything in the last fifty years, for the reason that to-day we have the tools; then we had comparatively none.

I hope and trust this bill will not pass.

Mr. BALLOU. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WARD,] my colleague on the committee.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to follow fully my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SMITH,] in opposing as a rule the extension of patents which have enjoyed a life of seventeen years under the act of Congress. I believe with the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] a member of the Senate Committee on Patents, that as a rule the enjoyment of a period of seventeen years should terminate the exclusive privilege of a patent. But because I believe in that rule, because I consider it salutary and wise, for that very reason when there is presented a case possessing circumstances and incidents which remove it beyond the reason of the rule, I am willing to take it up and consider it carefully, fairly, and judicially; and if in my judgment it is entitled to be brought into this House I am ready to join in reporting it with a favorable recommendation. I have no prejudice whatever that will prevent me from giving such a case candid consideration and fair judgment. And that is precisely the nature of the case that we have presented to us to-day upon the report of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. BALLOU.]

The inventor here is a poor man; and his case should not be prejudiced by the sentiment of hostility to monopolies to which my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New Jersey, has endeavored to appeal. I am as much opposed to monopolies as he is. I am against extending patents for the benefit of any man or any corporation that has enjoyed the fruits of the exclusive privilege provided by our patent laws. I will go with the gentleman from New Jersey to the extreme limit in enacting laws that shall protect the innocent infringer, the user of a machine or article purchased in open market without knowledge of the infringement of any patent. I would protect such an one by the strongest legislative enactments against suits and penalties at the instance of the patent-pirates who infest this country. But while I am opposed to monopolies, while I am in favor of protecting the innocent user, I am at the same time in favor of encouraging the poor inventor and developing the beneficent intention which lies at the bottom of the patent laws of this country—the encouragement of inventive genius and the promotion of the sciences and the arts.

What is the case here? A poor man in the State of Rhode Island invents this machine. The evidence produced by him before the committee concurs with the personal knowledge of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. BALLOU] in establishing the fact that up to the present time this inventor has been utterly without return or recompense for his invention. He has made nothing out of it; he has not realized a copper as the result of his labor. He has not been lacking in diligent use of the talent committed to him. Through good report and evil report, through storm and through trial he has held on to this invention, and has not parted with it to any monopoly that would be enabled by its capital and power to crush out the innocent users of these machines. He comes here to-day, not only poorer than when he started, having invested and lost all his means in the prosecution of this enterprise, but he comes here after years of diligent labor extending through the whole period, until his patent is about to expire. Now, just as day is beginning to break for him, just as he is upon the borders of this promised land, when people are ready to come forward and assist him, he comes here and asks—what? That Congress shall absolutely extend his patent? Nothing of the sort; but that we shall open the door for him so that he may go before the Commissioner of Patents and submit to the scrutiny of this officer the question whether or not he has been diligent through these years that have gone by, and whether he has received any remuneration for his invention. This proceeding is to take place not in a closet, not without notice, but after the Commissioner, under the rules of the Department, has given world-wide advertisement through all the organs to which people interested in these matters generally look for information—has advertised this man's application for extension so that all persons interested may come forward and say, if anything they have to say, why the application should not be granted.

There is no gentleman upon this floor, there is not a man in this country, who can contradict the absolute correctness of the statements I make—that this invention has been valuable, that this man has been faithful to his trust, but that he has realized nothing. With these facts established—and they cannot be gainsaid—what is to be said against granting this application? What is the objection to permitting this man to go to the Patent Office and submit his application for an extension? Nothing but the argument which my friend from New Jersey has used, that this poor man shall be crushed out because some overgrown monopoly has used its power improperly and has levied tribute upon the public in a burdensome and oppressive manner.

I am not here to attempt any eulogium upon the patent system of this or any other country. Gentlemen here are as well informed on that topic as I am. Suffice it to say that the history of inventive genius in this country and in the Old World is but the reflex of the progress and civilization of the age. I need not allude to the great achievements in the diffusion of knowledge and intelligence by the printing-press and through the various electrical inventions which have from time to time been perfected, nor to the conquering of space and the populating of empires through the railroad and steamship. Agriculture also must lay its tribute at the feet of the inventor. Invention has simplified husbandry in every stage of its progress, and the four hundred million bushels of wheat produced annually in the United States would be an impossible product but for these agencies. It has been well said:

Invention, system, capital, brains, are factors for success in most things in these days. The United States is supplying not only England, but Belgium, the Netherlands, and France, with bread at the present time, because the American inventor, comprehending the needs of the farmer, has supplied him with machinery to do the work of human hands.

Mr. Speaker, take a picture last year, for example:

Ride over those fertile acres of Dakota, and behold the working of this latest triumph of American genius. You are in a sea of wheat. On the farms managed by Oliver Dalrymple are thirteen thousand acres in one field. There are other farmers who cultivate from one hundred and sixty to six thousand acres. The railroad train rolls through an ocean of grain. Pleasant the music of the rippling waves as the west wind sweeps over the expanse. We encounter a squadron of war chariots, not such as once swept over the Delta of the Nile in pursuit of an army of fugitive Israelites, not such as the warriors of Rome were wont to drive, with glittering knives projecting from the axles to mow a swath through the ranks of an enemy, to drench the ground with blood, to cut down the human race, as if men were noxious weeds, but chariots of peace, doing the work of human hands for the sustenance of men. There are twenty-five of them in this one brigade of the grand army of one hundred and fifteen, under the marshalship of this Dakota farmer. A superintendent upon a superb horse, like a brigadier directing his forces, rides along the line, accompanied by his staff of two on horseback. They are fully armed and equipped not with swords, but the implements of peace—wrenches, hammers, chisels. They are surgeons in waiting, with nuts and screws, or whatever may be needed.

This brigade of horse artillery sweeps by in echelon—in close order, reaper following reaper. There is a sound of wheels. The grain disappears an instant, then reappears; iron arms clasp it, hold it a moment in their embrace, wind it with wire, then toss it disdainfully at your feet. You hear in the rattling of the wheels the mechanism saying to itself, "See how easy I can do it!"

An army of "shockers" follow the reapers, setting up the bundles to ripen before thrashing. The reaping must ordinarily all be done in fifteen days, else the grain becomes too ripe. The first fields harvested, therefore, are cut before the ripening is complete. Each reaper averages about fifteen acres per day, and is drawn by three horses or mules.

The reaping ended, thrashing begins. Again memory goes back to early years, to the pounding out of the grain upon the thrashing-floor with the flail—the slow, tedious work of the winter days. Poets no more will rehearse the music of the flail. The picture for February in the old Farmer's Almanac is obsolete. September is the month for thrashing, the thrasher doing its six hundred or seven hundred bushels per day, driven by a steam-engine of sixteen horse-power. Remorseless that sharp-toothed devourer, swallowing its food as fast as two men can cut the wirebands, requiring six teams to supply its demands! And what a cataract of grain pours from its spout, faster than two men can bag it!

The latest triumph of invention in this direction is a straw-burning engine, utilizing the stalks of the grain for fuel.

In another great agricultural product the following evidence has been presented to the Patent Committee of this House from a reliable source, namely:

The six great corn States of the Union are, I think, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, and Kansas. They produce more than half the corn raised in the country. Now, of what inestimable value is that one machine, the corn-sheller, to those communities! Those States, by the census of 1870, had 1,775,000 persons engaged in agriculture. It would require the entire farming community of those States to sit astride bar-shovels and handles of frying-pans one hundred days out of the three hundred and sixty-five to shell their corn by the old process. Take the crop of last year—1,500,000,000 bushels of corn. The entire population of the United States—every man, woman, and child, every individual of the 40,000,000 of us—would be obliged to spend the entire six working days of the week and till noon of Sunday to shell the crop by the old process. I do not know what would become of the country, Mr. Chairman, if we had to go back to those old times.

I need not allude to those achievements in this direction which have made our country illustrious. But while the gentleman from New Jersey was making his plea for the poor sewing girl, and depicting the oppressions of the sewing-machine monopolies, I could not help being carried back in my mind to the condition of the sewing girl before the sewing-machine was invented; and I will refer the gentleman from New Jersey to an argument upon this question which I had not expected to submit, but which he will find in Hood's poetical works, under the title of "The Song of the Shirt." I commend to him this picture of the former condition of the sewing girl:

With fingers weary and worn,
With eyelids heavy and red,
A woman sat in unwomanly rags,
Plying her needle and thread—
Stitch! stitch! stitch!
In poverty, hunger, and dirt;
And still with a voice of dolorous pitch
She sang the "Song of the Shirt!"

Seam, and gusset, and band,
Band, and gusset, and seam—
Work! work! work!
Like the engine that works by steam!
A mere machine of iron and wood,
That toils for Mammon's sake
Without a brain to ponder and craze,
Or a heart to feel—and break!

Mr. NICHOLLS. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. WARD. Certainly.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I desire to know from what authority the gentleman reads. [Laughter.]

Mr. WARD. I read from Tom Hood's "Song of the Shirt."

Mr. NICHOLLS. Good authority, sir.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it the "bloody shirt?" [Laughter.]

Mr. WARD. It is not.

Mr. NICHOLLS. So much the better.

Mr. WARD. Whatever may be said in opposition to these sewing-machines, I say here to-day plainly if these sewing-machines were here asking an extension of any patent I would be opposed to it. As I am at present informed of the profits of these sewing-machine companies, I would be opposed to giving them any further exclusive privilege in that line; but when my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] attempts to influence and prejudice this question by an appeal like that which he has made this morning, I reply to him that whatever may be said against the patent systems of this country and of other countries, in the main the world has been the gainer by them. It may be true that some people have made money. I admit it. I would rather see wealth reaped as the reward of toil of brain and wear of sinew than see it follow the hazard of the die in the gambling dens of speculation or see it in the golden shower which falls, unwrought for, from the bounty of an ancestor. I believe the men who toil and work in this world, and in this country especially, should reap the reward of their labors; and if they get rich I am glad of it. I am ready whenever a case like this comes up to give it fair and unprejudiced consideration, and according to my best judgment, uninfluenced by anything but the merits of the case, and to act on it as the circumstances seem to require.

Mr. BALLOU. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. KEIFER. I offer an amendment to the bill which I understand is not objected to by the friends of the measure.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

And provided further, That no prior assignee or purchaser of an interest, legal or equitable, in said patented invention shall acquire any interest therein by virtue of an extension of said patent under this act.

Mr. KEIFER. A single word, Mr. Speaker. It is rarely proper to extend a patent or to pass a bill authorizing the extension of a patent which has run for the period of seventeen years, as this patent has. It was originally patented in 1863, to date from some period in 1862. I am informed in this case, however, this man claims still to be the owner of that patented interest; that he never parted with it. Yet men are often mistaken; and it turns out after we pass a bill here through grace, and not because of any right, in order to reward some person who has shown great genius in inventing something that is valuable to the general public or something that is useful, it turns out, I say, that assignees who have acquired interest under that patent when the extension has been granted have acquired the entire interest, and the man in whose favor the bill has been passed is a mere name under which the extension has been obtained and under the law has no interest in it whatever.

The records of the Patent Office will show that almost all these patents, where extensions have been granted, do not, at the time, belong to the patentees; and when we have gotten through with the bill in favor of the original inventor we find that we have passed a law simply for the purpose of benefiting those who control monopolies and control patents—persons who are entitled to no grace at our hands at all. I do not concede we do anything on this question as a matter of right; but with this amendment which I have proposed I shall be satisfied with the passage of this bill.

Mr. BALLOU. I will yield now to the gentleman from Connecticut, after which I shall demand the previous question.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I had no thought or desire of saying anything on this question and do so now only on the suggestion of my friend from Rhode Island, resulting from my making some inquiries in the matter and because I am acquainted with Mr. Budlong, a very respectable man and an excellent machinist, who makes this application. I share in the general prejudice against renewing a patent after it has had seventeen years of life. If there be anything good in it people are apt to find it out as a general rule. But there are exceptions to all these rules. I knew this man as a very industrious man and of excellent private character, and that character he has maintained since he went to Rhode Island. He has saved all he could from his valuable work as a machinist and expended it in perfecting this invention, to the amount of $15,000. He has never made a dollar from it and is out that much. He owns, as he swears here—and I would believe him without his oath—the entire patent to-day. He was interrupted by the war. Of course, there was not much attention paid to those affairs at that day; and his services as a mechanic were extremely valuable to him and he devoted his time to mechanical work. He has now assurance of capable men they will assist him in putting this machine on the market. They are satisfied of its excellence. He has improved it from time to time. It is not in the shape it was eighteen years ago. Now he asks he may go to the Department and have a chance to save himself on his machine, owning the whole of it, having expended $15,000 on it, and never having made a dollar. While I am exceedingly jealous of all renewals I think from my knowledge of the man and the circumstances this should be an exception. I am willing to give him another chance.

Mr. BROWNE. I wish to make a single inquiry of the gentleman having charge of this bill. I would like to know why it is that, after fifteen years of trial, the inventor, if this be a valuable machine, has been unable to realize anything from it? That is an important question, with me at least, in determining how I shall vote on this question.

Mr. BALLOU. Before calling the previous question, I shall endeavor to answer the question of my friend from Indiana. The reason why this has not been introduced is because the patent was first obtained during the war, when everything was in an excited condition. The patentee was a poor man. He was not able to do anything other than to support his family at that time. After the war he had not the means. But a friend came to his assistance, and was ready to aid him. Just as he was about ready to proceed his friend died. Then there was a change in the machine, or method for which the machine was patented, (which was made for wood especially,) to use metal instead. Then Mr. Budlong was obliged to adapt his machine to meet this change. It had not been introduced, but still metal was used instead of wood for pegging boots and shoes, and it was necessary that he should accommodate his machine to that change. Then the machine was perfected so as to use metal instead of wood. But a new application was made to perfect the papers in the case. That was in 1876. From 1873 to that time the depression in business kept him from being able to introduce his machine. Now it is perfected, though it has never been used by anybody. It is entirely owned by Mr. Budlong, who is a poor man. He has spent the best portion of his life in perfecting it, has devoted all his leisure hours to its perfection, and it has cost him, reckoning his labor and time, at least $15,000.

As I have said, he is a poor man and has received nothing whatever from it. He now asks that he may have the privilege of going before the Commissioner of Patents to see if he can have the privilege of extending it for seven years. The Committee on Patents believe it to be an exceptional case, and they think that it is just and right that the inventor who has spent so much time and so much money should have the benefit of his invention, which will be a blessing to him as a remuneration for his long years of labor; and I hope that this House will do what I believe to be just and right in this case. I hope the bill will pass; if possible, unanimously. I now demand the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered. The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. Mr. HOUSE. We cannot hear what the question is here. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

It is proposed to add to the bill the following:
And provided further, That no prior assignee or purchaser of an interest, legal or equitable, in said patented invention shall acquire any interest therein by virtue of the extension of such patent under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 53.

Mr. McKENZIE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask for the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. What is the pending question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. McKENZIE. Then I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays, as we understood here the question was on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no objection, the demand for the yeas and nays is withdrawn.

There being some misapprehension the Chair will again put the question to the House on the engrossment and third reading.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 53.

Mr. SPARKS. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPARKS and Mr. BALLOU were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 73. So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BALLOU. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOTT. I make the point of order that the previous question operated only on the third reading, and not on the final passage of the bill, and that the morning hour has now expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill goes over.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The morning hour has expired—

Mr. GARFIELD. But the demand for the previous question is pending.

Mr. McMAHON. That makes no difference; it has not yet been ordered.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The morning hour expired before the demand was made.

The SPEAKER here resumed the chair.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I make the further point that the bill has already occupied two days in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That point is not well taken. It would make no difference though it occupied many days, being here under old rule.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. But the previous question has not been seconded.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, rose.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] moves that the consideration of private business to-day be dispensed with. That requires a two-thirds vote.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOTT. As I read the rules a majority can refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Friday.

Mr. KNOTT. I understand that; but cannot a majority of the House, under the rule, refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The House can refuse to go into Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. KNOTT. Let the rule be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the third paragraph of clause 6 of Rule XXIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and, if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

Mr. BRIGHT. I call for the reading of Rule XXVI, which governs the operation of the rule which has just been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting.

Mr. BRIGHT. I also ask that the first clause of Rule XXVIII be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor, and no rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present, nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month after the call of States and Territories shall have been completed, preference being given on the first Monday to individuals and on the third Monday to committees, and during the last six days of a session.

Mr. KNOTT. Now the question I desire to ask the Chair is whether the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] can be defeated by a majority of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House can refuse to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. KNOTT. Then if a majority of the House refuses to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar will it not be in order to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] however, rose, and the Chair recognized him for the supposed purpose to move to suspend the rules so as to set aside the consideration of private business.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. If the Chair will permit me, I wish to say that I did not make that motion, nor did I intend to make it. I rose to give notice that if the House should refuse to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, I should then move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DUNNELL. As I understand, there is but one motion now pending—that of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The SPEAKER. Rule XXVI, requiring a two-thirds vote to suspend the consideration of private business on Friday, was inserted in the House, not by the Committee on Rules; and there seems to be an incongruity between this and the other rule which has been read. In the absence of any motion to dispense with the consideration of private business the Chair submits the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] that the House shall now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar. If that should be voted down, then the Chair, as at present informed, would submit a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does the Chair rule or not that that motion would require a two-thirds vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not rule until occasion requires.

Mr. O'CONNOR. As I understand, the pending motion is that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The motion is that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, the object being to consider business on the Private Calendar. If the House should refuse to consider private business the Chair would then submit the proposition to proceed to public business.

Mr. PAGE. If the motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, is it not in order to raise the question of consideration, and would not that question of consideration be determined by a majority of the House?

The SPEAKER. This is in effect a question of consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I submit that under Rule XXVI private business on this day has the precedence over any other business of the House; and that business cannot be dispensed with except by a two-thirds vote of the House.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, after we had passed Rule XXIV, when we came to XXVI the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] moved to amend what had been reported by the Committee on Rules by inserting the clause that requires a two-thirds vote of this House before Friday can be used for any other business; and that amendment was adopted.

The SPEAKER. Suppose a majority of the House refuses to proceed to the consideration of private business, would the gentleman say the House could not proceed to other business, or must the House in such event immediately adjourn?

Mr. CONGER. No, sir. I contend that the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee to proceed to business on the Private Calendar cannot be negatived except by a two-thirds vote.

The SPEAKER. If a majority of the House should not be willing to proceed to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar that would leave the House, according to the construction of the gentleman from South Carolina, with no power to proceed to the consideration of any other business except by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am aware, sir, that these rules are new and have not received as yet a full construction by the Chair or by the House. I beg leave to submit this view of the construction of the rules in relation to private business:

I understand the rule to be that Friday of each week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business. That has become one of the standing rules of the House. That rule I understand to be imperative upon the House, requiring the House to proceed to the consideration of private business on Friday of each week.

Mr. GARFIELD. Suppose the majority of the House say they will not proceed to the consideration of private business.

Mr. BRIGHT. The view I was presenting is, that if this be one of the standing rules of the House it is imperative upon the House to proceed in order under it. As a matter of course the question must be submitted to the House whether it will go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. And suppose that the House by a majority vote shall refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; that would not relieve the House of its duty, that would not suspend a standing rule of the House which would be still operating upon it, and which requires the House to proceed to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, except in accordance with a provision made by the House for its own government, that is, a two-thirds vote before it can proceed to the consideration of any other business. That is the point I make, even if my motion shall be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The equity of this case is clear, that it was intended by the adoption of the amendment to the rules offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] that a two-thirds vote should be required to dispense with private business on Friday. The Chair thinks, however, that thereby an incongruity was produced in the rules. The Chair is at a loss to know what remedy there is, when the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar is entertained and a majority of the House votes down that motion. However, that case may not arise, and gentlemen may be anticipating trouble needlessly.

Mr. BRIGHT. I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that a majority may refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will repeat what he stated. The equity of the case plainly looks to the extent of requiring a two-thirds vote to dispense with the consideration of private business on Friday. But the Chair is at a loss to know, in case a motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar and voted down, what remedy there would be.

Mr. BRIGHT. By any other course the Chair will see how easily he would be pushed to the wall by the general rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The report of the Committee on Rules was harmonious on this subject until amended by the House.

Mr. BRIGHT. When a motion is made to proceed to other business than private business on Friday, then the general rule becomes operative which requires a two-thirds vote to dispense with the consideration of private business on Friday. The proposition now submitted is not for a suspension of the rules, but before the House can proceed in opposition to this rule a two-thirds vote will be required. That is the point I make.

The SPEAKER. There is another rule which gives any member the right to raise the question of consideration. If a majority of the House shall proceed to consider any particular business, then the next business in order is to be proceeded with. The House may say to-day that it will not proceed to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, and then the Chair would be left to entertain a proposition to proceed to the consideration of the business next in order.

Mr. BRIGHT. I maintain that the consideration of any other business to-day would be subject to the point of order, that unless the general order for to-day shall be suspended by a two-thirds vote the House cannot proceed to the consideration of other business.

The SPEAKER. How can the Chair make the House go into Committee of the Whole for consideration of business on the Private Calendar, if a majority of the House, according to third paragraph of clause 6, Rule XXIV, shall refuse to do so?

Mr. BRIGHT. Then the House would vote to repudiate the rules it has made for its own government.

The SPEAKER. There is an incongruity in these two rules.

Mr. McLANE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McLANE. I want to ask the Chair whether, in case the House shall refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar under Rule XXIV, it will not be obliged immediately, under Rule XXVI, to proceed to the consideration of private business on the House Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The House Calendar is made up of public bills.

Mr. McLANE. Pardon me; the point I make is this: The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] has moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. It is manifestly competent for the House under Rule XXIV to refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. But when the House shall have done so, then Rule XXVI will come into operation, and by that rule, unless a two-thirds vote shall relieve the House from it, we must go on with private business in the House. That is the point I make.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read clause 9 of Rule XVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

At any time after the expiration of the morning hour it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills raising revenue or general appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER. If the House shall refuse now to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, then clause 9 of Rule XVI might become operative.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I ask for the reading of the third paragraph of clause 6 of Rule XXIV.

The SPEAKER. That has already been read.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I did not hear it read; I will not ask for it to be read again.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, this rule was amended on my motion when the new rules were before the House for consideration. The Committee on Rules had reported a rule providing that every Friday should be set apart for the consideration of private business unless otherwise ordered by a majority vote. This was amended so as to require a two-thirds vote. Now my point is that to-day is absolutely set apart by the rule of the House for the transaction of private business unless otherwise ordered by a two-thirds vote. If the House by a two-thirds vote should say, "We will not enter upon the consideration of private business to-day," then it will be competent for any gentleman to move to go on with other business. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] can then make a motion to proceed with the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

But, Mr. Speaker, it will be remembered that in the debate which was had when this rule was amended it was insisted by others as well as myself that Friday should be as absolutely protected for private business, unless a two-thirds vote should otherwise order, as the other days of the week are protected for public business, unless it should be dispensed with by a two-thirds vote. I can see no conflict at all.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If a majority of the House should vote against going into Committee of the Whole, does the gentleman then propose to go on in the House with the Private Calendar?

Mr. DUNNELL. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. What would we do with a bill making an appropriation of money? It could not be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I ask for the reading of another portion of the rules which seems to me to settle this question. I refer to the last paragraph of the sixth division of Rule XXIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and, if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. If Rule XVI be construed literally in the manner for which gentlemen contend there would be no morning hour on Friday, because literally the rule provides that "Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business." That says nothing about a morning hour; and if you adopt a literal construction, then immediately after the reading of the Journal on Friday it would be in order to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to proceed to the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. GARFIELD. The morning hour on Friday, being for private reports, is for "private business."

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Rule XVI makes no exception of the morning hour. The language is:

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. The language just read shows that the morning hour of Friday as well as the rest of the day is to be devoted to private business.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to call attention to this point: that there is in the rules a very apparent distinction between the right of an individual member and the right of a majority of the House. For instance, the morning hour having begun, the call of committees for reports can be demanded by any member; it is a right given to him under the rules. The call of committees for reports can only be dispensed with by a motion to suspend the rules so as to dispense with the morning hour. But no individual member can demand as his right that the House shall go into the Committee of the Whole. That requires a vote of the majority of the House; it is a right pertaining to the majority, not to any individual member. Hence, when a majority of the House refuses to go into Committee of the Whole, the rule applies that other business shall then be in order.

Mr. GARFIELD. I see that the language of the rule needs a little rectification, so as to obviate a seeming contradiction; but I think there is no real contradiction. A motion to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole on public business does undoubtedly require on Friday a two-thirds vote. But that is not the proposition now pending. The present motion is to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of private business. A majority vote of the House can carry this motion; but a majority vote can also refuse to go into Committee of the Whole on private business. If not, we should be in this very singular predicament—that less than a majority of the House could put the House into Committee of the Whole by a vote, for instance, of forty in the affirmative against seventy in the negative. There never was a rule which said that upon a vote forty members could carry a motion affirmatively over seventy members voting the other way. That is an absurdity which nobody ever thought of. The meaning of the rule is therefore this: that if a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar does not receive a majority vote it fails; and then the House is at liberty by the vote of a majority to proceed with other business. There are two ways of getting around private bills: one is by a two-thirds vote suspending the rule; and the other by two motions and two votes; one to refuse to go to private bills; and the other to go to public bills; and that is what we are doing now.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, adopting the argument of the gentleman from Ohio, it is very easy to perceive by a construction of the rule he would defeat the very object of the rule and the very object of the policy which has been provided for in the rule. Suppose a majority of the House refuses; he insists that would operate as an avoidance of the two-thirds rule; and in that way he would in fact nullify the two-thirds rule, making it nugatory and of no avail whatever. Then what protection is there this day? The protection which was intended has failed. As a matter of course, we must look to some interpretation which will reconcile the apparent conflict. Suppose a majority does refuse. That majority vote does not suspend the rules requiring a two-thirds vote to take up other business. When the Speaker finds he is confronted by these two apparent inconsistencies in the rule, what is to be the prevailing opinion, what the construction which is to be given to it? It is and ought to be as the Speaker has already admitted and ruled, that the law itself being imperfect, equity should obtain and require in fact a two-thirds vote to deprive the Private Calendar of this day which has been solemnly dedicated to it by the rule.

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. BUCKNER. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. On the point of order.

Mr. BUCKNER. That will come up hereafter.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is hardly pending.

Mr. BUCKNER. There is no question before the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Chair has decided the point of order I do not wish to take up the time of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not decided; for the condition of affairs anticipated has not yet arrived.

Mr. ROBINSON. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, there are certain suggestions which ought to be made right here and now. When we take this matter into consideration, (and I do not quite agree with the conclusions of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GARFIELD,) why, in the first place, was this clause adopted to the twenty-sixth rule? We all remember that it was the suggestion of the gentleman from Minnesota. The Committee on Rules had provided that the determination of the precise question now before the House should be by a majority vote. That was their report. We had adopted the third clause of Rule XXIV, leaving it to the majority of the House to determine that vote. The House then proceeded to Rule XXVI, and upon the reading "that Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House," a motion was carried to amend it so as to require a two-thirds vote to change that direction. What, then, was the purpose of the House? It was unmistakably by that vote to devote Friday to private business unless a two-thirds should otherwise direct. That was the deliberate will and expression of the House on this rule. The House acted advisedly on the matter and after debate.

Now, sir, in what shape are we practically? That is what the Speaker wants us to touch upon. If one motion is carried in order, as the gentleman from Ohio has said, to avoid private business—if one motion is made that is to set aside private business, it will require two-thirds to carry it; but if another motion is made which is in the same direction and to the same purpose, then the two-thirds rule does not operate. The House, I submit, did not intend to put into the rules such an absurdity as that. The House did intend, we all say, to require a two-thirds vote to set aside private business on Friday. There is not any higher law than the rules of the House, which determine the practice in the consideration of business. When the gentleman from Ohio says it requires a majority to settle it, he must find that determination in the rules; and the rules say that one more than a third only is necessary to keep private business before the House on Friday.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman allow the Chair to interrupt him?

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall be glad.

The SPEAKER. The Chair said the equity of the rules read ran to require the consideration of private business except when suspended by a two-thirds vote; and the Chair said also he did not know in what condition the House would find itself in case the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee to proceed to the consideration of the business of the Private Calendar was voted down in the House by a majority vote.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the precise point, and I have but one more statement to make. In anticipation of what may be the result of the vote, we all say that if one more than a third of this House voting determines to retain private business here to-day, it shall stay. That was the purpose of the rule. Now, I say if upon the vote we find one more than a third here say we shall go into the Committee of the Whole, then by force of that rule that vote is carried although a majority has not so voted.

Mr. WHITE. I understand this is the question before the House: Does it require a two-thirds or a majority vote to defeat the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT.] That is the practical question now before the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this motion had been made prior to the adoption of the new rules, there would have been no difficulty about it. I hold in my hand the old rule; it reads as follows:

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private bills and private business in preference to any other, unless otherwise determined by a majority of the House.

The SPEAKER. The old rule simply gave the private business preference on Friday.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; it was only necessary to have a majority vote against the motion to proceed to consider private business. Now, when this report of the Committee on Rules was before the House for consideration, I rose in my place and offered to amend by inserting the old rule, and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] having the matter in charge antagonized the proposition, and remarked substantially that it was intended by this legislation to change the old rule in some respects. In what respect? In respect to a majority vote.

Now, the word "majority" was put in for the instruction of the House to relieve them from the two-thirds vote which was necessary by an old rule of April 26, 1828, either to proceed to or dispense with private business on Friday or Saturday. Such was the decision upon that rule. Subsequently the rule was changed, in May, 1874, by the insertion of the word "majority," and thereafter the majority of the House had control of the motion to proceed to private business on Fridays. Now, the word "majority" was left out designedly from the new rule pending before us. Consequently, I apprehend that the last clause of Rule XXIV and Rule XXVI are to be construed, as the lawyers say, in pari materia; that is, they are to be construed together, and when so done are entirely consistent and define a clear line of action for the House.

What is the last clause of this Rule XXIV?

On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and, if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

That is a rule imperative on the Chair. It is followed by Rule XXVI, which declares that—

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting.

What did the House mean when it changed the rule? What does this two-thirds provision mean? It means that the last clause of Rule XXIV and Rule XXVI are to be construed together, and to defeat a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar there must be a two-thirds vote against it. If it does not do that, what is the situation which confronts us? Suppose the motion submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee is defeated, and the gentleman from New Jersey moves to proceed to the consideration of public business, will the Speaker attempt to decide that a majority motion will carry it? Suppose I rise in my place and present the point of order that a majority alone have voted for it, and two-thirds not having voted for the motion it cannot prevail. In the face of this rule will the Speaker decide that a majority alone carries the motion as against private business? I apprehend not. There is such a thing as attending to private business in a manner other than in the Committee of the Whole. But the intention of the rule of calendars was that private bills should be considered by being placed on a "private calendar" and taken up on Fridays. Hence I fancy the reasonable construction of the rules for taking up private business is that the latter clause of Rule XXIV, which is, "It shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar," shall be construed together with Rule XXVI, which says, "Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by a two-thirds vote of the members present and voting."

Thus you have a clear, consistent order of procedure in that a two-thirds vote is necessary to defeat the motion to consider business on Friday.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be an inconsistency in the rules upon this subject. If there be, they are to be construed in accordance with the principles which govern the construction of this in common with every statute and body of laws. The inconsistency seems to consist in this: That by a clause of the twenty-fourth rule it seems to be provided that, as it will require a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole for private business, which motion will be decided by a majority, a majority may defeat the consideration of private business to-day. But by the twenty-sixth rule it seems to be quite as clearly and quite as strongly provided that it shall require a two-thirds vote to defeat the proceeding of the House to business on the Private Calendar.

Now, if we are to continue these two rules, the first principle of construction is that the whole body of rules is to be construed together, and all contradictory parts to be reconciled if possible. But it seems to be impossible to reconcile the provisions of these rules, because there is no other mode of conducting private business on Friday except in the morning hour and in the Committee of the Whole, because all the private business is by the rules either in the morning hour or in the shape of bills on the Calendar in Committee of the Whole, which the House itself cannot get charge of until it goes into the Committee of the Whole. If that be true, then it seems impossible to reconcile these two rules, because if you can refuse to go into committee by a majority vote under the twenty-fourth rule, you defeat the positive requirement of the twenty-sixth rule, which requires a two-thirds vote to keep the House from private business to-day. But if it be impossible to reconcile them, then another principle of construction comes in, and that is that the last provision shall govern, and that the last provision is to be considered as the final and decisive action of the House on the subject, and as an amendment governing everything going before it and repealing the effect of every inconsistent provision; and that when it provides that two-thirds are required, it expresses the construction of the House of its previous provision.

Mr. WARNER. When adopted on the same day and on the same vote?

Mr. ROBESON. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. How does the gentleman dispose of Rule XXVI.

Mr. ROBESON. I say it governs, because it was adopted subsequently to the last clause of Rule XXIV, with the last clause of Rule XXIV before the House and the House acting thereon and saying in effect we will not submit this to a majority but it shall require a two-thirds vote. This is a principle on which all statutes and all bodies of laws must be construed where they are absolutely inconsistent.

Mr. WHITE. Then we agree.

Mr. NEW. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROBESON. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. NEW. Does the gentleman from New Jersey say that if Rule XXVI instead of being a separate rule was a clause of section 6 of Rule XXIV, there would then be any difficulty in construing that part of the section; and if not, how can the fact that it is a rule and found in a different part of the text of the rules create any difficulty? The rules constitute but one act. Shall not, therefore, what is contained in Rule XXVI be construed with what we find in clause 3 of section 6 of Rule XXIV just the same as if it was a part of section 6?

Mr. WHITE. That is right.

Mr. ROBESON. What I said was that Rule XXVI provided that a two-thirds vote should be necessary to set aside the consideration of private business, and that that was the final action of the House and was in irreconcilable opposition to the clause of Rule XXIV, because an affirmative motion to go into the Committee of the Whole and the clause of Rule XXIV provides in effect that that part of the machinery of getting to private business might be stopped just there by a majority refusing to go into committee, and would thus nullify Rule XXVI, unless an affirmative motion can be carried by less than a majority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT.]

Mr. ROBESON. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] should be withdrawn and the regular order should then be demanded, will not Rule XXVI carry the House just where the gentleman from Tennessee wants it to go—that is, to the consideration of private business, or does it require the motion to go into committee?

The SPEAKER. Still it will require a motion. The Chair does not know how the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House could be got into the chair of the committee unless a motion was made and agreed to by the House to go into the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. ROBESON. Then it requires a majority vote to go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It does.

The question being taken on Mr. BRIGHT's motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House, there were—ayes 80, noes 58.

So (no further count being called for) the motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. WHITE. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. PRICE. That is very good, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] has just got back, after having been away for ten days.

Mr. WHITE. Oh; I can stand that. I am responsible to my constituents for my action here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that motion at present, the House having determined to go into Committee of the Whole.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. McLANE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3262) granting a pension to Harry E. Williams.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Harry E. Williams, late hospital steward of the One hundred and thirty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay him a pension from the 26th day of January, A. D. 1863, the date of his discharge, at the rate allowed by existing laws to disabled private soldiers of the late war of the rebellion, for injuries sustained and disability incurred by the said Harry E. Williams while in the service of the United States, and in the line of his duty in the said war of the rebellion.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I rise to a question of order. The last time the House was in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar another and a different bill from that which has just been read had been read to the House and was under consideration—I refer to the bill which stands at the head of the Calendar, the bill (H. R. No. 2798) for the relief of L. Madison Day.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only proceed under the existing rules of the House. By the existing rule the Chair is required to have read to the committee the first bill on the Calendar. That bill has now been read.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is not the first bill on the Calendar that has just been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would say to the gentleman from South Carolina that, although it is not the first bill on the Calendar, it is the bill which when the committee last rose was pending.

Mr. SPARKS. The point made by the gentleman from South Carolina is that the bill which he has indicated was pending when the House was last in Committee of the Whole; that the committee stopped at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. Nevertheless, unless the unfinished business is now considered, it might never be considered. The Chair therefore rules the first bill to be considered is the bill that was unfinished when the committee last rose.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The bill for the relief of L. Madison Day was read to the Committee of the Whole, and the committee rose on the reading of that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman from South Carolina to listen to the reading of the fourth clause of Rule XXIII.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. In Committees of the Whole House, business on their calendars shall be taken up in regular order, except bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, which shall have precedence, and when objection is made to the consideration of any bill or proposition, the committee shall thereupon rise and report such objection to the House, which shall decide, without debate, whether such bill or proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present; whereupon the committee shall resume its sitting without further order of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would ask the gentleman from South Carolina to make his motion or objection in terms of the rule which has just been read, because the Chair has no discretion, under the rulings in the House, since the adoption of the new rules. The House has uniformly disposed of the business as it was left unfinished under the old rule.

The Chair desires to state to the Committee of the Whole the condition of business. When the committee was last in session the pending bill was the bill (H. R. No. 3098) immediately preceding the bill which has just been read. It will now be for the committee to decide whether it will dispose of that business or take up the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. O'CONNOR. When the House was last in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar it had under consideration the bill which is now at the head of the Calendar, the bill for the relief of L. Madison Day. The bill was read to the House, and before the report could be read to the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WHITE] moved that the committee rise, and that motion was agreed to. The House subsequently adopted an order to hold a session on the Wednesday evening following for the purpose of considering pension bills alone on the Private Calendar. But that did not interfere with the order of business on Friday. This is the first Friday the House has resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar since the bill I refer to was under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina will take note of the statement of the Chair that the bill which has just been read was the bill before the committee on last objection day. If the Chair does not take note of that fact, none of the bills to which objection was made would ever be considered.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The bill I refer to was before the committee on last consideration day, and there has been no Friday devoted to private business since.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not dealing with the last consideration day, but the last objection day; and he proposes to bring to the consideration of the committee every bill which was objected to. The Chair is obliged to take this course of proceeding unless otherwise directed by the committee.

Mr. BRIGHT. This is a matter of the construction of the rule. Under the old rules there were two calls of the Private Calendar—one for consideration and one for objection. The new rules have entirely done away with the call of the Private Calendar for objection. There is no calendar before the committee now, nor can there be one, except for consideration in the regular order of the bills as they stand upon the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no hesitation at all in saying to the committee that he will now submit the question upon the bill.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) One moment. It seems to me that this matter can be unraveled very easily and properly. It is true that this bill came up for consideration upon objection day, and now comes up naturally as unfinished business. In the mean time, the rules of the House have been changed so as to require that all bills on the Private Calendar shall be considered in their regular order, not subject to objection. This bill, coming up now as unfinished business, naturally is the one to be first considered to-day, and when it shall have been disposed of the committee will then go to the top of the Calendar and consider the bills in their order as they stand upon the Calendar. That is an equitable mode of disposing of the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. That is what the Chair intended to do.

Mr. BURROWS. And in that way all the bills will be reached in their order.

Mr. BUCKNER. It seems to me that this difficulty grows altogether out of a misapprehension of the facts, not of the rules, connected with this case.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman rise to a point of order?

Mr. BUCKNER. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. What is it?

Mr. BUCKNER. My point of order is that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. O'CONNOR] is right, and that the bill for the relief of L. Madison Day, at the beginning of the Calendar, is the bill to be first considered to-day. The record will show that that bill was under consideration on the last consideration Friday. It is true that by a special order of the House an evening session was devoted to the consideration of pension bills, and when the committee rose on that evening the bill which has been read was pending.

The CHAIRMAN. That point of order has already been made by the gentleman from South Carolina, and the Chair has decided it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If in order, I move that the committee now proceed to consider the first bill on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is perfectly willing to submit that motion to the committee.

The motion of Mr. O'CONNOR was agreed to.

L. MADISON DAY.

The committee accordingly proceeded to consider the first bill on the Private Calendar, being a bill (H. R. No. 2798) for the relief of L. Madison Day; reported from the Committee on Claims by Mr. O'CONNOR.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,400 to L. Madison Day, of Louisiana, that being the amount of purchase-money received by the United States from said Day for a parcel of land in the city of New Orleans, condemned as the property of Judah P. Benjamin, the title to which was invalid and defective.

Mr. BREWER. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of L. Madison Day, of Louisiana, have had the same under consideration, and report thereon as follows, namely:

This is an application to Congress by petitioner to be repaid the purchase price of certain real estate purchased by him from the United States at a judicial sale, the title to which was defective, and has wholly failed, and the purchaser evicted from the property.

This case has heretofore been before Congress and has been four times successively favorably reported upon, (twice in the Senate and twice in the House,) with accompanying bills for the payment of the claim, but which failed for want of time. (Senate Committee on Claims, report No. 339, first session Forty-fourth Congress; House Judiciary Committee, report No. 308, first session Forty-fourth Congress; Senate Committee on Claims, report No. 595, second session Forty-fifth Congress; House Committee on Claims, report No. 55, third session Forty-fifth Congress.)

It appears from the evidence in the case, and is stated in the reports of the various committees, that in 1865 two squares of ground, in the parish of Jefferson and State of Louisiana, were seized and libeled under the confiscation act of 17th July, 1862, in the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Louisiana, as the property of Judah P. Benjamin. A motion was issued and an order of publication made in one of the newspapers in New Orleans, citing and admonishing all persons whatsoever who had or pretended to have any right, title, or interest in or to the property libeled to appear at a specified time and show cause, if any they had, why the property should not be condemned according to the prayer of the libel; and no one having appeared, a default was entered and a pro confesso taken against all persons whatsoever, and the court, after regular proceedings and after finding and declaring in the decree that the said two squares of ground were the property of Judah P. Benjamin, condemned the same as forfeited to the United States and ordered them to be sold.

It also appears that after the condemnation and order of sale of the two squares of ground, but before the sale, the United States district court for the eastern district of Louisiana made and entered of record, under the eighth section of the act of Congress of July 17, 1862, (12 U. S. Stat., 592,) authorizing the United States district courts to establish such form of decree and to direct such deeds to be executed and delivered to the purchasers, at sales under said act, as should vest good and valid titles to the property sold in the purchasers, a general order, requiring the marshal in all cases of the sale of real estate to cause all mortgages resting on the property condemned and ordered to be sold to be canceled, and to annex the certificate of the recorder of mortgages to the deeds given to the purchasers, showing the erasure and cancellation of the same. (See Supreme Court Record, Day vs. Micou, page 38.)

It further appears that at the time of the seizure, condemnation, and sale of the said two squares of ground there was a mortgage for $10,000, with interest, on one of the said squares of ground, but of the existence of which petitioner had no knowledge at the time of the sale.

It also appears that the marshal, at the time of the sale of the said two squares of ground, publicly announced that all mortgages, if any, resting on the property, would be canceled and annulled, and the certificate of the recorder of mortgages showing the cancellation would be annexed to the deeds of the purchaser, and that petitioner, relying on the faith of the proceedings, order of court, and declaration of the marshal, purchased the two squares of ground, and that he paid for the one mortgaged as aforesaid the sum of $5,400, and that he afterward received the marshal's deed with the certificate of the proper officer attached showing the erasure and cancellation of the Benjamin mortgage, and that it was from this certificate alone that petitioner had the first intimation or information of the existence of any mortgage on the property at the time of the sale. (Supreme Court Record, Day vs. Micou.)

That some time after the delivery of the deed as aforesaid, and the payment of the purchase price, the heirs of the mortgagee instituted suit in the proper State court to foreclose the mortgage, and the court decided that notwithstanding the proceedings on the part of the United States, which were set up and relied upon as a bar to the action, the property was liable to the mortgage, and a decree of sale was made by the State court. An appeal was taken by petitioner from the judgment enforcing the mortgage against the property to the supreme court of Louisiana, which affirmed the judgment of the lower court, and a writ of error was there prosecuted to the Supreme Court of the United States, which affirmed the judgment of the supreme court of the State, and petitioner was evicted from the property which he had purchased, as already stated, from the Government, free from incumbrance and with a clause of warranty in the deed.

The sole and only question, then, is as to the right of petitioner to a return of his money by reason of the failure of the title and his eviction from the property.

And it does seem that after so many favorable reports, and after fully considering the justness of the claim, if ever there was a case in which a party was entitled to a return of his money, this is that case. It is a case in which petitioner has received nothing for his money, and where the Government has parted with nothing of any value for the money which it received through its officers and agent from petitioner.

Now, on the broad principles of equity and justice, petitioner is clearly entitled to a return of his money; for the Government no more than an individual can have any right to retain money received without consideration and on representations and a warranty of title which have wholly failed.

In the cases of United States vs. State Bank and Merchants' Bank vs. United States, (6 Otto, 30, 36,) the rules of law applicable to individuals were applied to the United States by the Supreme Court, and it was held that the United States, like an individual, must refund money received without consideration given for the same, and which, according to natural justice and equity, ought to be refunded. Now, according to the principle of these decisions, the right of petitioner to a return of his money is clear and unquestionable; for surely the Government cannot, according to the principles of natural justice and equity, be said to have any right to retain money received for property to which it had no title and from which the purchaser has been evicted by the decision of its own highest court; for "a vendor" (says the Supreme Court of the United States, in Allen vs. Hammond, 11 Pet., 72) "is bound to know that he actually has that which he professes to sell."

And many other courts have recognized and enforced the same principle, on the ground that it was a legal fraud for a party, even through honest mistake, to represent that he had that which he did not own, and to sell and convey the same as his, and that the purchaser who relied on and was misled by the representation was entitled to be fully relieved and indemnified as to all the consequences of the purchase. (Hart vs. Swaine, L. R., 7 Chan. Div., 42; Bowling vs. Pollock, 7 Mon., 32; Flynn vs. Campbell, 6 Mon., 286; Smith vs. Roberts, 23 Ala., 312; Jones vs. Clifford, L. R., 3 Chan. Div., 779; Schofield vs. Templer, John. (Eng.) Ch., 166.)

In Hart vs. Swaine, L. R., 7 Chan. Div., 42, where a vendor represented land as freehold, and sold and conveyed the same as such, and received the purchase-money, but the purchaser afterward, for the first time, discovered that the property was really copyhold, and the vendor alleged that he made the representation believing it to be true: Held, that assuming he had made the representation bona fide, the vendor had committed a legal fraud; that the sale must be set aside, and the purchase-money repaid with interest, and that the vendor must pay all the expenses which the purchaser incurred in consequence of the purchase.

And in Bowling vs. Pollock, 7 Mon., 32, where a vendor through honest mistake represented that he had the legal title to certain property, and thought he was selling, and the purchaser supposed he was buying, the same, the court said: "This turns out to be entirely untrue. The thing supposed to be bought and sold was not there, or any part of it. This was a clear mistake, and no fraud is imputed to the parties. What, then, ought to be the effect of that mistake? The principle that the chancellor will vacate contracts on the ground of mistake is too familiar to need either proof or illustration."

It is, therefore, seen that the Government was bound to know that it actually had that which it had declared and adjudged, through its own court, to be its own property, and which it undertook to sell and convey to petitioner free from incumbrance and with a warranty of title.

And as the Supreme Court of the United States, in Day vs. Micou, 18 Wall., 156, decided that this property, which the Government had declared was its own, and undertook to sell and convey to petitioner, free from incumbrance, and with a warranty of title, was subject to the mortgage which the Government had caused to be erased and canceled, and the certificate of erasure annexed to the deed given to the purchaser, and the purchaser evicted from the property, the Government is, on the plainest principles of common right and justice, bound to restore to petitioner the purchase price.

For indebitatus assumpsit, as is well said by the court of appeals of New York, lies in all cases where the defendant has in his hands money which, ex æquo et bono, belongs to the plaintiff. (79 N. Y., 582, 64 lb., 319.)

And all the authorities hold that money paid without consideration, or upon a consideration which has failed, may be recovered back. (Swire vs. Francis, Law Rep. 3, Appl. Ca., part 1, page 106; 53 N. Y., 286; 72 N. Y., 582.)

And "the powers of a chancellor reach far enough to afford relief for a failure of consideration from whatever cause." (White & Tud., L. C. in Eq., vol. 2, part 1, page 986, 4th Amer. ed.)

For the Government, then, to keep money obtained without consideration, and on false representations and a warranty of title which has wholly failed, would be intolerable injustice.

It matters not that the court may have been mistaken in supposing that it had authority under the statute to condemn and order the property to be sold free of mortgage. And it matters not that the marshal, in selling the property free of mortgage and warranting the title, was but acting under and in pursuance of the mistaken and erroneous orders of the court.

For the Government, by accepting the proceeds of the sale, ratified and adopted all the acts and representations of its agents in and through which the money was obtained, as is fully shown and sustained by all the authorities cited in the reports of the different committees.

The Judiciary Committee of the House, in their report (through Mr. McCrary) No. 308, first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, on the claim of memorialist, says:

"Your committee are further of the opinion that the United States cannot rightfully keep the purchase-money paid by the claimant, and now in the Treasury, for the reason that the same was paid under a mistake, and for property which the United States had no right to sell or convey.

"The Government, through its agents, undertook to sell Mr. Day property which it did not own and had no right to sell. It attempted, through said agents, to make a conveyance of the property, but the conveyance was void, and passed nothing of any value.

"Before the invalidity of the sale was discovered by either party, the purchase-money, less costs, had been paid into the Treasury.

"The officers and agents of the United States represented that they had power and authority to condemn, sell, and convey the said property, and the United States ratified and adopted their acts and representations by receiving the proceeds of the sale and covering the same into the Treasury.

"The rules of law, that a subsequent ratification of an act done as agent is equal to a prior authority, and that the receipt of the proceeds of an unauthorized sale is a ratification and adoption thereof, are so well understood as to require no more than a mere statement of them.

"And it is equally well settled that the law upon this subject applies to the act of the sovereign ratifying the act of its officers. In Buron vs. Denman, 2 Exchequer R. 188, Baron Parke, in giving the opinion, after stating the rule as between individuals, adds: 'Such being the law between private individuals, the question is, whether the act of the sovereign, ratifying the act of one of its officers, can be distinguished. On that subject I have conferred with my learned brethren, and they are decidedly of opinion that the ratification of the Crown, communicated as it has been in the present case, is equivalent to a prior command.'

"And in Secretary of State of India vs. Sahaba, 13 Moore's P. C. C., it is said: 'If there had been any doubt upon the original intention of the Government, it has clearly ratified the acts of its agent, which, according to the principle of the decision in Buron vs. Denman, is equivalent to a previous authority.'

"In Fremont vs. United States (2 Court of Claims R. 476) it is distinctly held that the rule by which the principal is bound by a subsequent ratification of the unauthorized acts of an agent 'is as applicable to the contracts and obligations of the United States as to those of individuals.' And the same rule is laid down in other cases decided by the same court.

"In Reeside vs. United States (2 Court of Claims R. 29) it is said: 'It is the settled rule of this court, and the principle upon which it was established, to administer the same law between the Government and a claimant which is administered between ordinary suitors.'

"In Elwell vs. Chamberlain (31 N. Y., 619) the court, in reference to a principal taking the benefit of a bargain by his agent, says:

"They cannot be permitted to enjoy the fruits of the bargain without adopting all the instruments employed by the agent in bringing it to a consummation.

"The plaintiffs, therefore, stand in the same position as if they had made the representation or authorized it to be made."

And the above views of the Judiciary Committee on memorialist's claim are quoted and adopted by the House Committee of Claims in their Report No. 55, third session Forty-fifth Congress.

And:
"These views of the Judiciary Committee (says the Senate Committee on Claims in their report, [by Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin,] No. 505, second session Forty-fifth Congress, on petitioner's claim) are so consonant with reason and justice, and so well sustained by the whole current of authority, that it is impossible that they can be otherwise than correct.

"For 'where the principal ratifies a sale made by the agent, by receiving its fruits, he is thereby bound by the agent's representations.' (Wharton on Agency, section 174; Oaks vs. Turquand, L. R. 2 H. L. 325; Doggett vs. Emerson, 3 Story, 700; Kibbe vs. Hamilton Ins. Co., 11 Gray, 163.)

"If a principal accept, receive, and hold the proceeds or beneficial results of a contract, he will be estopped from denying an original authority or a ratification. (Bolton vs. Hillersden, 1 Ld. Raym., 224; Thorold vs. Smith, 11 Mod., 72; Byrne vs. Doughty, 13 Geo., 46; Johnson vs. Smith, 21 Conn., 627.)

"Where the proceeds of a sale are taken, this is an adoption of the sale. (Brewer vs. Sparrow, 7 B. & C. 310; Byrne vs. Morris, 4 Tyr., 455.)

"And an adoption of the agency in part is an adoption in toto, as the law does not permit a principal to adopt an agent's unauthorized act so far as it is beneficial and reject the residue. By adopting part he becomes bound by the whole. (1 Comst., 433; 10 N. Y., 325; Story Agency, sect. 250; 33 Barb., 610; 34 N. Y., 30, 88; 38 Barb., 534; 8 Pick., 56; 19 Pick., 300; 23 Vt., 565; 14 N. Hamp., 145.)"

"In Vesie vs. Williams, 8 How., 134, 157, the court says:
"If a principal ratify a sale by his agent, and take the benefit of it, and it afterward turn out that fraud or mistake existed in the sale, the latter may be annulled, and the parties placed in statu quo.

"The principal in such case is profiting by the acts of the agent, and is hence answerable civiliter for the acts of the agent, however innocent himself of any intent to defraud.

"Was the purchaser deceived, and has the vendor adopted the sale made by deception, and received the benefits of it? For, if so, he takes the sale with all its burdens.

"Whatever the previous authority of the agent, (says Wilde, B., in Udell vs. Atherton, 7 H. & N., 172,) whatever the principal's own innocence, he must, as it seems to me, adopt the whole contract, including the statements and representations which induced it, or repudiate the contract altogether.

"Wherever an agent makes a contract on behalf of his principal, whether with or without authority, the principal cannot approbate and reprobate the contract. He must adopt it altogether, or not at all; he cannot at the same time take the benefit which it confers and repudiate the obligation which it imposes. (Bristowe vs. Whitmore, 9 House Lords, C. 391, per Lord Kingsdown.)"

"In Buron vs. United States, (6 Court of Claims R. 171, 197-199,) where the Secretary of the Treasury retained and refused to pay over a small portion of a judgment of the Court of Claims under the captured and abandoned property act, on the ground that a sufficient amount had not been deducted for expenses, and the Government was sued for said balance, and the defense was that the Government was not liable to be sued for the acts of a public officer, the court said:

"This case we think distinguishable clearly from those which spring from the tort or laches of a public officer. It arises, not from the wrongful act of the Secretary, but from the continuous withholding by the defendants of the money of the claimants. It is an action founded upon ratification—the strongest ratification known to the law—where the principal comes into court still holding that which his agent took. It belongs to a class where the law regards the principal as having done and still continuing to do that which the agent did.

"The Government is not liable like the ordinary principal for the negligence and mistakes of its agents, and their authority is limited and defined by law, and the law is notice to all the world. But that defense cannot prevail where the Government adopts and ratifies the mistake, or receives and accepts the benefit of the unauthorized act."

"Therefore it does not lie in the mouths of the defendants in this suit to say that their Secretary's act was illegal, and that they are not responsible for unlawful acts because their Secretary acted in their name and strictly on their behalf and they have retained the money which he withheld, &c."

The Government cannot therefore either at law or in equity be heard to say that its officers and agents had no legal right or authority to sell the property free of mortgage and with warranty. It is estopped to deny the authority and warranty of the title in the deed by the receipt of the price. By accepting the proceeds of the sale it became as fully bound for all the acts and representations of its officers in consummating the sale as if it had previously and expressly authorized the acts and representations to be made. The receipt of the money was an adoption of all the acts and means used in procuring it; for the Government no more than an individual can take the proceeds and benefit of an unauthorized transaction without making itself liable for all the acts and misrepresentations by which the money was obtained, because the receipt of the proceeds of an unauthorized transaction is, according to all the authorities, a full ratification and adoption of all the means used, and of all the instruments employed, and of all the misrepresentations made in consummating the transaction.

The Government is therefore in law, as well as in equity, bound to return the purchaser his money, as the same was obtained without consideration and on representations and a warranty of title which have failed. For the Government to keep money obtained without consideration and on representations and a warranty which have failed would be intolerable injustice.

And as petitioner took nothing by his purchase, and the Government parted with nothing of any value, it would be illegal, inequitable, and unconscionable for the Government to keep money thus wrongfully obtained.

Besides, the court was expressly authorized and empowered by the statute (12 U. S. Stat., 592, sec. 8) "To make such orders, establish such forms of decree and sale, and direct such deeds and conveyances to be executed and delivered by the marshal thereof, where real estate shall be the subject of sale, as shall fully and efficiently effect the purposes of this act, and vest in the purchasers of such property good and valid titles thereto."

It is, therefore, seen that the court, under this provision of the statute, had a general authority and discretion conferred upon it by the act; and the petitioner, who was a bona fide purchaser, (Cole vs. Johnson, 53 Miss., 25; Green vs. Biddle, 8 Wheat.,) had a right to presume that the court had properly exercised the discretion and apparent authority, vested in it under the statute, in making the general order requiring the marshal, in all cases of the sale of real estate under the act, to cause all mortgages resting on the property sold to be canceled and to annex the certificate of erasure to the deeds given to the purchasers. (See Cole vs. Johnson, 53 Miss., 94; Gaines vs. Kennedy, 53 Miss., 104, 109, and foregoing authorities.)

The Government is therefore bound by the acts of the court under the authority aforesaid; and the validity of its acts, as far as the Government is concerned and the liability of the Government arising from the same, cannot be made to depend on the degree of wisdom or skill which may have accompanied the exercise of the general power and discretion vested in the court.

"And," (says the Senate Committee on Claims in their Report No. 505, second session Forty-fifth Congress, on petitioner's claim,) "where a public officer is held out as having authority to do an act, or is empowered in his capacity as a public officer or agent to make the declaration or representation for the Government, and which is relied on as the ground of relief, the Government is bound by the acts and declarations of the agent." (Lee vs. Munroe, 7 Cranch, 366, 368; Story's Agency, sec. 307a; 12 Court of Claims R. 24-5.)

"For," as is well said by the Court of Claims, (McKee vs. The United States, 12 Court of Claims R. 527-8; Thompson's case, 9 ib., 187-196,) "where a statute expressly defines the power of an officer it is notice to all the world; but where a statute confides a discretion to an officer, a party dealing with him in good faith may assume that the discretion is properly exercised." And where a discretion is conferred on an officer and a contract is made in which he has exercised that discretion, the validity of the contract cannot be made to depend on the degree of wisdom or skill which may have accompanied its exercise. (United States vs. Speed, 8 Wall., 72, 83; 14 Pet., 448; 12 Wheat., 19; 6 Ell. & B., 377; 25 Eng. L. & Eq., 114; 1 Wheat., 459.)

Undoubtedly, then, the purchaser had a right to rely on the warranty and the representations of the Government through its own officers, the court and the marshal, that the property was to be sold free of mortgage, and was under no obligation to inquire for himself as far as the Government was concerned. He was in possession of the Government's own declaration, through the court and the marshal, that the property was to be sold free of mortgage, if any such there was, and had a right to rely on that representation without inquiry. (Boyce Ex'rs vs. Grundy, 3 Pet., 210, 218; Mead vs. Burin, 32 N. Y., 275; Brown vs. Rice's Adm., 26 Gratt., 474; Young vs. Harris, 2 Ala., 108; Parham vs. Randolph, 4 How., (Miss.), 435, 451.)

"For," no man can complain that another has too implicitly relied on the truth of what he has himself stated." (Rynell vs. Sprye, 1 D. M. & G., 660, 710, per Lord Cranworth, L. J.; Rawlins vs. Wickham, 3 D. & J. 318; Smith vs. Mining Company, L. R. 2 Eq., 264; Brown vs. Rice's Adm., 26 Gratt., 474.)

There is no foundation, then, for any excuse or even a plausible pretext for not repaying petitioner his money.

The doctrine of caveat emptor, but which is not recognized or enforced in Louisiana, and which only applies even in the common-law States to the acquisition of the title, and does not apply to the equitable claim of a purchaser to be reimbursed on the failure of the title, (55 Miss., 338,) has not even one grain of sand on which to repose in a case like this.

The acts and declarations of the agents and officers of the Government, in selling the property free of mortgage and warranting the title, precludes the Government from such a defense. And the Government, by accepting the proceeds of the sale and covering them into the Treasury, has ratified and adopted the acts of its officers in making the sale. For the Government cannot be permitted to take the fruits and benefits resulting from the act of its officers and repudiate the obligations which the transaction imposes. By accepting the proceeds of the sale the Government was profiting by the acts and means used in procuring the money, and is hence held, according to all the authorities, as we have seen, to have adopted and ratified the whole transaction.

The defense of caveat emptor is, therefore, destitute of all foundation. It has never been applied in any case where there was any misrepresentation respecting the title.

In Preston vs. Frye, 38 Md. R., 222, where a trustee sold property under a decree representing the title to be good, but which the purchaser afterward discovered was defective, the court, even after the final ratification of the sale, annulled the sale, and ordered the purchase-money to be refunded.

And in Lawrence vs. Cornell, 4 John. Ch., 542, where an officer sold property representing that the same was free of mortgage when it was not, Chancellor Kent ordered that the incumbrances should be removed by the application of so much of the proceeds of the sale as might be necessary for that purpose, so as to make good to the purchaser an unincumbered estate, according to the terms of his purchase. (S. P., 2, Harr. & Gill, 176, 177.)

And in Davis et al. vs. Railroad, 1 Wood's C. C. R., 661, where a receiver was in possession of mortgaged premises under foreclosure proceedings in a State court, and was dispossessed by the marshal under a decree in bankruptcy by a United States court, and the property was sold by the assignee in bankruptcy free of the mortgage, it was held, on a bill filed by the receiver against the assignee in bankruptcy and the purchasers, that the sale must be set aside and the purchase-money restored to the purchasers.

"This," (says the court in the above case, page 666) "is clearly the justice of the case, and, in my judgment, the law is not contrary thereto."

And where the title fails for want of jurisdiction and authority in the court to make the order of sale under which the property is sold, the purchaser is entitled to a return of the purchase price. (Morgan vs. Hammett, 23 Wis., 41; Davis et al., trustees, vs. Railroad, 1 Wood's C. C. R., 661; Bell vs. Craig, 52 Ala., 215, 217; Bland vs. Bowie, 53 Ala., 153, 162; 6 Allen, 549, 550; 13 Gray, 564; 8 Humph., 328; 38 Me., 47, 51.—Senate Committee Claims report, No. 505, second session of the Forty-fifth Congress.)

And the reason is that, as the sale is void, the purchaser has taken nothing by his purchase, and the title which it was intended should pass has not been divested, and hence the purchase-money belongs ex aequo et bono to the purchaser.

In Schwinger vs. Hickock (53 N. Y., 280) it was held that a purchaser under an execution which was void could recover the money back from the plaintiff in execution.

And in Newdigate vs. Davy (1 Ld. Ray., 742) it was held that the plaintiff could recover (in an action for money had and received) from the defendant money which he had received and which had been paid over to him under a void authority; that is, under the sentence of a court which had no jurisdiction whatever over or in respect of the subject-matter. (See Chitt. Cont., 947, 11th ed.) So money paid on a judgment which is afterward reversed or vacated may be recovered back. (11 Met., 248; 10 Wend., 345; 13 S. & R., 292; 1 Harr. & J., 400; 24 Wend., 32; 2 Day, 153; 72 N. Y., 582.)

And a purchaser at a judicial sale in Louisiana can always recover back the purchase price, unless he has expressly bought at his own risk and peril and excluded his right of recovery by a stipulation of non-warranty. (Huss vs. Neville, 3 Louisiana Annual R., 327; Scott vs. Featherston, 5 Ib., 314.)

In Morgan vs. Hammett, (23 Wis., 41), where a probate judge, through mistake and error of law, supposed he was incompetent to grant an order of sale by reason of his having been of counsel for some of the parties in interest, and transferred the case to the circuit court, which made an order of sale under which the property was sold, it was held, on a bill filed to set aside the sale for want of jurisdiction and authority in the circuit court to make the order of sale, that the sale was void, and that the purchaser "surely should be repaid the money he had advanced upon it."

In Bell vs. Craig, (52 Ala., 215), the court, in reference to a void sale and the right of the purchaser to the purchase price, says:

"If the sale was void the purchase-money was not assets in the hands of the administrator-in-chief. (Petit vs. Petit, 32 Ala., 288.) It belonged ex æquo et bono to the purchaser. Neither the administrator de bonis non nor the creditors or heirs of the intestate had any claim or right to it."

In Bland vs. Bowie, (53 Ala., 152, 162), although it was considered that sales of lands of a decedent made under an order of the probate court are judicial sales, to which the maxim caveat emptor applies in all its rigor, yet the court said:

"We do not doubt that it is competent for the purchaser, at any time after he discovers that the proceedings for the sale are void, to resort to a court of equity to compel the heir or devisee to elect a ratification or the rescission of the contract of purchase. If the purchase-money has been paid and distributed to the heirs, or applied by the personal representatives to the payment of debt, a court of equity would compel a conveyance of title from the heirs, if they could not successfully impeach the fairness of the sale." (Bell vs. Craig, 52 Ala., 215.)

And where a purchaser at a judicial sale fails to obtain a valid title to the property, and the purchase-money has gone to pay a debt of the owner, or has discharged an incumbrance on the land, the purchaser is entitled to be repaid the amount of his purchase before the owner or his heir can recover the land or free it from the equitable claim of the purchaser to be reimbursed the amount of the purchase price. (Sands vs. Lynham, 27 Gratt., 304; Hudgins vs. Hudgins, 6 Gratt., 320; Valle's Heirs vs. Fleming's Heirs, 29 Mo., 152; Shoyer vs. Nickell, 55 Mo., 269; Evans vs. Snyder, 64 Mo., 516; McLaughlin's Admin'r vs. Daniel, 8 Dana, 182; Bentley vs. Long, 2 Stro. Eq., 43; Howard vs. North, 5 Texas, 315; Grant vs. Lloyd, 12 S. & Mar., 191; Mocklee vs. Gardner, 2 Har. & G., 176, 177; Petty vs. Clark, 5 Pet., 481, p. 53, Miss. 95, 102, 104, 105.) Senate Committee on Claims Report No. 505, second session Forty-fifth Congress.

Now, the principle of all these cases is incompatible and wholly irreconcilable with the idea of any right in the Government to retain money for which it has given no consideration.

And they show too clearly to admit of any doubt or controversy that the doctrine of caveat emptor only applies to the acquisition of the title, and does not apply to the equitable claim and right of a purchaser at a judicial sale to be reimbursed the purchase price when the title fails in consequence of the sale being void. For it is contrary to natural right and justice that one man should be enriched at the expense of another, or that one man should keep another man's money where he had neither parted with any right nor given him anything whatsoever in return for his money.

Now, the petitioner took nothing by his purchase, because the Government, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, had nothing to sell, had nothing which it could sell and convey in the way and manner in which the property was sold to the petitioner. The Government has therefore obtained the money of petitioner without any equivalent, and is in law, honor, and justice bound to restore the same; and it will not do for a great government to resort to any merely technical pretext or unjust defense for an excuse to keep the money of a citizen when it has given him nothing whatever in return for his money.

Justice in such a case rises superior to and overshadows all other considerations. Hence, there is nothing in the suggestion that the money was paid through error of law, and cannot, therefore, be recovered back. For if there was any error of law in the manner in which the property was sold, it was the error of the court alone, which had the sole power under the statute of saying and directing how the property which it condemned as forfeited to the United States should be sold and disposed of, and is not, therefore, an error for which the purchaser is in any way responsible. The purchaser relied, as he had a right to do, on the action of the court and the representations and warranty respecting the title. (See Senator JONES's (of Florida) report, No. 329, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 2; 53 Miss. R., 95.)

The mistake, then, (as is said by the Senate Committee on Claims, in their report, No. 505, second session Forty-fifth Congress), must be treated as the mistake of the Government and not as the mistake of the purchaser, or, at least, it must be regarded as a mistake which was contributed to and superinduced by the mistake and misrepresentations of the agents of the Government, and who had an apparent authority and discretion in the matter.

And where a party has made a mistake to which the other has by his acts contributed, even unintentionally, the contract will be rescinded. (Torrence vs. Bolton, Law Reports, 14 Eq., 124; Fane vs. Fane, L. R., 20 Eq. Ca., 698; Torrence vs. Bolton, L. R., 8 Ch. Appls., 118.)

And more especially will a court of equity grant relief against a mistake of law where the mistake was in any way or manner induced or contributed to by any misrepresentation of the law by the other party. (Wheeler vs. Smith, 9 How., 55; Schofield vs. Templer, John. (Eng.) Ch., 116; Jordan vs. Stevens, 51 Me., 78, 83; Id., 140, 142; Snyder vs. May, 7 Harris, 238; Ex parte James in re Condon, L. R., 9 Ch. Appls., 614; Evarts vs. Strodes, adm., 11 Ohio, 488; Brown vs. Rice's Adm., 26 Gratt., 470-1; Hart vs. Swaine, L. R., 7 Chan. Div., 42; Cooper vs. Phibbs, L. R., 2 H. L. Ca., 149; Weeks Appl., 90 P. F. Smith, 425; 51 Ala., 154; Kerr on F. & Mist., 400; Bispham's Pr. Eq., sect. 188, p. 242; Pomeroy on Sp. Perf. of Cont., sect. 377, p. 321.)

For (says the Senate Committee on Claims, Report No. 505, second session Forty-fifth Congress) even an innocent misrepresentation of law as well as a misrepresentation of fact entitles the party who is misled by such misrepresentation to relief both in equity and at law.

In Evarts vs. Strodes, adm., 11 Ohio, 488, and Drew vs. Clarke, Cooke's (Tenn.) R., 374, 380, it was held that: "Where a contract is executed under a mistake in point of law, which mistake is produced by the representations of one of the parties, the other may be relieved as well as if the mistake was as to a matter of fact." (S. P., 31 Conn., 517.)

In Jordan vs. Stevens, 51 Me., 78, 83, it is well said: "And there would be still stronger reasons for granting relief in such a case if the party from whom the property had been obtained had been led into his mistake of the law by the other party." (Sparks vs. White, 7 Humph., (Tenn.), 86; Fitzgerald vs. Peck, 4 Littell, (Ky.), 27. See also Freeman vs. Curtis, 51 Me., 140.)

And in Brown vs. Rice's Adm., 26 Gratt., 467, 470-71, it is distinctly and clearly shown that a court of equity will relieve for a mistake brought about by a misrepresentation of the law.

And in Snyder vs. May, 7 Harris R., 238, the court emphatically says: "Whatever doubts may exist in regard to the power of a court of equity to correct the mistake of a party to a contract in matter of law, there can be no question that such mistake is the subject of correction where it is produced by the representation of the opposite party." (2 Barr, 122; Drew vs. Clarke, Cooke, 374.)

In Fane vs. Fane, L. R. 20 Eq. Ca., 698, where a father, through honest mistake of law, represented to his son that he had a power under a settlement to charge portions in favor of his younger children (but which were, in fact, already charged) and would give that power up if the son would make a settlement, it was held that the son, who relied on the representations, was entitled to have the resettlement set aside on account of the misrepresentation and mistake.

In ex parte James in re Condon, L. R., 9 Ch. Appls., 614, where a party on the demand of trustees in bankruptcy paid over money, which he had received on execution against the bankrupt, under a mistake of law as to their right to the same, (he supposing from the demand being made that they had a legal right to it,) it was held that he was entitled to recover back the money.

In Wheeler vs. Smith, 9 How., 55, where an executor through honest mistake and misapprehension of law represented to the heir, on being asked his opinion, that the will was legal and valid, (that this was the opinion of all the lawyers he had consulted, and was his opinion,) and that in the event of a suit, which he wished to avoid, and which would be attended with trouble, delay, and expense, the will would be sustained, but that if he wanted a sum of money he could have it by way of settlement and compromise, relief was granted from a release by the heir to the executor for $25,000, notwithstanding the heir had stated to the executor that in his opinion the will was illegal, and that in case of suit it would ultimately be so declared, but that he supposed he would have to consider the will legal and valid, and accept the offer.

This case, therefore, illustrates in a high degree the extent to which a court of equity will go in granting relief where the party's conduct has been mainly determined by the misrepresentation of the law through innocent mistake and misapprehension of the other party.

And where the mistake of law is mutual, but attributable to the agent of the party seeking to take advantage of it, equity will relieve. (Green vs. Morris, &c., 1 Beas. Ch., 165; Woodbury, &c., vs. Charter Oak Insurance Company, 31 Conn., 517; Fane vs. Fane, L. R., 20 Eq. Ca., 698; 2 Bibb, 322.)

And where parties deal with each other under a mutual mistake as to their respective legal rights, (the one supposing that he has the legal right and the other that he has none,) and the one parts with nothing and the other acquires or takes nothing by his purchase, equity will relieve. (Bingham vs. Bingham, 1 Ves. Sen., 127; Hitchcock vs. Giddings, 4 Price Ex., 135; L. R., 1 Ch. App., 53; Earl Beauchamp vs. Winn, L. R., 6 H. L., 223, 234; Jones vs. Clifford, L. R., 3 Ch. Div., 790-792; King vs. Doolittle, 1 Head, (Tenn.), 77, 86.)

In Stewart vs. Stewart, 6 Cl. and Fin., 968, Lord Cottenham, in reference to Bingham vs. Bingham, 1 Ves. Sen., 126, in which the defendant had sold to the plaintiff an estate which was, in fact, already his, but which both parties, under a mutual mistake of law, believed to belong to the defendant, (and in which the master of the rolls decreed repayment of the purchase-money, saying it was a plain mistake,) said:

"That if it were necessary to consider the principle of that decree it might not be easy to distinguish that case from any other purchase in which the vendor turns out to have no title. In both there is a mistake, and the effect in both is that the vendor receives and the purchaser pays money without the intended equivalent."

And in Champlin vs. Layton, 1 Ed. Ch., 471, 475, it was held that a contract entered into under a mutual misconception of legal right, amounting to a mistake of law in the contracting parties, by which the object and end of the contract, according to its intent and meaning, cannot be accomplished, is as liable to be set aside or rescinded as a contract founded in mistake of matters of fact. (S. P., 51 Miss., 520.)

And in Lawrence vs. Beaubien, 2 Ball. (S. C.) R., 623, it was held, in an elaborate and well-considered opinion, that a mutual mistake in both parties as to the law was ground for relief from the obligation of a contract by which one party acquired nothing, and the other neither parted with any right or suffered any loss, and which ex æquo et bono ought not to be binding.

At pages 647, 648 of the above case, Mr. Justice Johnson well and forcibly says: "If this proposition is to be considered with reference to the rules of morality, there could be no diversity of opinion about it. The plaintiff seeks in this action to recover that which of natural right belongs to the defendant. It is a universal principle, founded in reason, that no one is entitled to have or retain that which ex æquo et bono belongs to another; a principle found in every code, and circumscribed in its application only by positive rules founded in the conveniences and necessities of mankind; and, when rightly understood, says Sir Henry Finch, the very maxims and principles of the positive law will yield to it, as to a higher and more perfect law. (Finch's Law, book 1, ch. 3.)"

And it is now settled in England that a common mistake of a matter of law inducing an agreement will modify its effects in equity as applied to the true state of the law, upon the same principle as a common mistake upon a matter of fact; and that a court of equity will grant relief against an agreement made under such circumstances. (Re Saxon, &c., 2 John. & Hem., 408, 412; Stone vs. Godfrey, 5 De G. M. & G., 76; Chitty on Cont., 1041, 11th ed.; Earl Beauchamp vs. Winn, L. R., 6 H. L., 223, 234.)

Indeed, there is no case to be found in the books where a party, as in this case, took nothing by his purchase, and the other parted with nothing of any value, has a court of equity ever refused relief. And this more especially where the purchaser was induced to make the purchase through the mistake and misrepresentation of the law and facts by the other party.

Where a vendor intends to sell, and the vendee to purchase, a subsisting title, but which in fact does not exist, a payment of the purchase-money (says the Supreme Court of the United States) "would be a payment without the shadow of consideration; and no court of equity is believed ever to have sanctioned such a principle." (Allen vs. Hammond, 11 Pet., 71.)

For a mutual mistake as to the legal title of the vendor is ground for relief. (Flyne vs. Campbell, 6 Mon., 286; Bowling vs. Pollock, 7 Mon., 32; Smith vs. Robertson, 23 Ala., 312; Irick vs. Fulton, 3 Gratt., 193.)

And it is now well settled that a mistake is as good a ground for relief in equity as fraud. (Torrence vs. Bolton, L. R., 14 Eq. Ca., 124, 132, 134; Lord St. Leonarda on Vendors and Purchasers, 14th ed., 120; Daniel vs. Mitchell, 1 Story R., 190.)

And in a case of a mutual or common mistake as to title, although there is no fraud, a court of equity will relieve. (Jones vs. Clifford, L. R., 3 Chan. Div., 779; 10 Vt., 570; 31 Vt., 383.)

For a court of equity can relieve against the consequences of a mistake of law as well as against mistakes in fact. (Stone vs. Godfrey, 5 D. M. & G., 76; In re Condon, L. R., 9 Chan., 609; Rogers vs. Ingham, L. R., 3 Ch. Div., 357; Re Saxon, &c., 2 John. & Hem., 408, 412; Broughton vs. Hutt, 3 De G. & J., 510.)

Mellish, L. J., in Rogers vs. Ingham, L. R., 3 Ch. Div., 357, says: "I think that no doubt is as was said by Lord Justice Turner, this court has power (as I feel no doubt it has) to relieve against mistakes in law as well as against mistakes in fact; that is to say, if there is any equitable ground which makes it, under the particular facts of the case, inequitable that the party who received the money should retain it."

* Stone vs. Godfrey, 5 D. M. & G., 70.

Indeed, a court of equity always relieves when "the court is of opinion that it is unconscientious for a person to avail himself of the legal advantage which he has obtained." (Torrance vs. Bolton, Law Reports, 8 Ch. Appls., 124; 4 Dana, 309, 314, 318; 3 B. Mon., 513; 1 Met. (Ky.), 153; 2 ib., 226, 238; 51 Me., 143; 11 Ohio, 488; 21 ib., 127; 3 My. & K., 99; 19 Texas, 303; 2 McCord, Ch., 455; 1 Hills, Ch., 251; 6 Harr & J., 500; 1 Ed. Ch., 471; 2 Bail. (S. C.), 623; 1 St. Eq., secs. 1384, 1387, 1389, and foregoing authorities.)

"And where the result of denying relief (says Judge Story) will be to give the other party an unconscionable advantage, and the fact of such misapprehension is admitted or proved to the entire satisfaction of the court, it would be strange if it were not a sufficient ground for equitable interference. The denial of relief in such cases would seem to be at variance with the long-established doctrines of equity, and a reproach to the law itself." (St. Eq. Jur., sec. 138c. See also 7 Geo., 67; 19 Conn., 548; 21 Conn., 139; 31 Geo., 120, 121.)

And while every man, as is usually said, is presumed to know the law and is usually bound as if he had such knowledge, whether he has it or not, yet it is now well settled, by the best-considered cases both in England and America, that there is no absolute rule which conclusively presumes such knowledge as a fact, where that fact is important. (Black vs. Ward, 27 Mich., 191; Regina vs. Mayor, &c., L. R., 3 Q. B., 628; Martindale vs. Falkner, 2 Com. B., 719; Jones vs. Randall, Cowp., 38, 40, per Lord Mansfield.)

In Black vs. Ward, 27 Mich., 191, the court, in a well-considered opinion, says: "In Regina vs. Mayor of Tewkesbury, L. R., 3 Q. B., 628, this supposed maxim was very clearly explained, and it was held that, where an actual knowledge was in question, the legal presumption could not apply."

Blackburn, J., uses this language: "From the knowledge of the fact that Blizard was mayor and returning officer, was every elector bound to know as matter of law that he was disqualified? I agree that ignorance of the law does not excuse. But I think that in Martindale vs. Falkner, 2 C. B., 719, Maule, J., correctly explains the rule of law. He says: 'There is no presumption in this country that every person knows the law; it would be contrary to common sense and reason if it were so.'"

In Jones vs. Randall, Cowp., 38, 40, Lord Mansfield said: "As to the certainty of the law, * * * it would be very hard upon the profession if the law was so certain that everybody knew it; the misfortune is that it is so uncertain that it costs much money to know what it is even in the last resort."

And Mr. Kerr, in his Treatise on Fraud and Mistake, page 406, expressly says that the presumption that every man knows the law is rebuttable and may be disproved, the same as a presumption in regard to a matter of fact. See also 2 Bailey, (S. C.), 623; 18 Wend., 423; 2 Barb. Ch., 505, that an allegation of mistake of law is capable of investigation and proof.

And it is now too well settled, both by adjudged cases and text-writers, to admit of any doubt or controversy that the maxim ignorantia legis, &c., is not of universal application in equity, but is subject to many well-recognized qualifications and exceptions. (Jordan vs. Stevens, 51 Me., 78; ib., 140, 143; 51 Ala., 151, 154; 19 Texas, 303, 309; 29 Vt., 239; Miss. R., 520; 3 Duer, 318, 324; Bispham's P. Eq., sec. 187, p. 241, 2d ed., and foregoing authorities. See also 8 Wheat., 174; 1, Pet., 14.)

In Moreland vs. Atchison, 19 Tex., 309, 310, the court well and admirably says: "The general rule, it has been truly said, is justified by considerations of public policy; and yet so harsh a rule, founded upon a presumption so arbitrary, ought to be modified in its application, by every exception which can be admitted without defeating its policy."

Even Chancellor Kent, who stated the general rule very broadly in Shotwell vs. Murray, 1 J. Ch., 512; and Lyon vs. Richmond, 2 J. Ch., 51, but the decisions in which turned upon other distinct grounds, so far changed and modified his opinions in the subsequent case of Storrs vs. Baker, 6 J. Ch., 166, as to admit that there were exceptions to the general rule. He said: "It is rarely that a mistake in point of law, with full knowledge of all the facts, can afford ground for relief," and that "ignorance of law, with knowledge of the fact, cannot generally be set up as a defense."

Now this modified and guarded language of the learned and distinguished chancellor shows very clearly that he did not consider the rule of universal application, but that it was subject to some exceptions. (4 Dana, 316; 2 Bailey R., 631.)

"That every man must be presumed to know the law," said Mr. Justice Campbell in Benard vs. Fiedler, 3 Duer, 318, 324, "is indeed a necessary rule in the administration of criminal justice, but its application to bar a civil right is not demanded by any reasons of public policy, and in many cases is a resort to a fiction, not for the purpose of promoting but of defeating justice. Hence courts of equity have long struggled against the doctrine, and have excepted many cases from its operation."

And Chancellor Walworth in Hall vs. Reed, 2 Barb. Ch., 500, 505, said: "And courts have sometimes granted relief against mistakes of law, where it could be done without injuring the rights of those who were ignorant of any such mistake when their rights occurred."

And where the contract of the parties, through a common mistake of law as to the legal effect of the language used, fails to embody their real agreement and understanding, a court of equity will relieve. (Murray vs. Beekman, 9 Paige, 189; 67 N. Y., 283, 290; Everts vs. Strode, 11 Ohio, 480; 2 Curtis, 277; 4 J. J. Mar., 225; 1 Beas. Ch., 165.)

"And" (says a great jurist and a learned court, in concluding their review of all the cases) "we think it creditable to the courts and to the profession that with all the zeal which has been sometimes manifested, to make the law excluding relief, in cases of equity, in every case of pure mistake of law, absolute and inflexible, the sense of justice has steadily withstood the refinements of logic on the one hand and the blind love of formal symmetry upon the other. We trust the principle that courts of equity feel compelled to grant relief upon the mere ground of the misapprehension of a clear rule of law, which has so long maintained its standing among the fundamental rules of equity jurisprudence, is yet destined to afford the basis of many wise and just decrees, without impugning the general rule that mistake of law is presumptively no sufficient ground of equitable interference." (St. Eq. Jur., sec. 138f; 51 Miss., 520.)

In re Saxon, &c., 2 John & Hem., 412, the court said: "A question has sometimes arisen how far this court can interfere to rectify a mistake of law, but having regard to all the authorities, and especially to Stone vs. Godfrey, I have no doubt of the jurisdiction."

"And there are many cases to be found" (says Lord Chelmsford, Law Rep. 6 H. L., 234) "in which equity upon a mere mistake of the law, without the admixture of other circumstances, has given relief to a party who has dealt with his property under the influence of such mistake."

And it has been repeatedly held by many courts in elaborate and well-considered opinions, that a mere error of law, where the law was doubtful and not well settled, entitled the party mistaken or uninformed as to his legal rights to relief. (Lamont vs. Bowley, 6 Har. & J., 526, 525; Cumberland Coal Company vs. Sherman, 20 Md., 152-3; 51 Me., 140; 1 Dess., 437; 19 Texas, 303; 1 Beas. Ch., 165; Bispham's P. Eq., 188, page 243; 14 Conn., 123.)

And in ex parte Ogle L. R., 8 Ch. Appls., 715, Lord Justice James said: "That it would be impossible, without hardship and injustice, such as no court is bound to inflict, to make a trustee personally answerable for money which has been bona fide paid by him under a misapprehension of the law; which misapprehension was really occasioned by the language of the Legislature."

Now the principle of this and the above decisions is very applicable to this case, where the whole difficulty and cause of the mistake on the part of the court in ordering the property sold free of mortgage arose from the obscurity of the words of the statute. For the statute provided that the proceedings, under the same, should be in rem, and the Supreme Court of the United States has frequently held that they were solely in rem. (Miller vs. United States, 11 Wall., 268; Tyler vs. Defrees, 11 Wall., 345; Confiscation Cases, 20 Wall., 104; Semmes vs. United States, 1 Otto, 26.)

And it had also been settled by a long course of decisions both in England and America, that a purchaser under a decree in rem took an absolute title to the property, free from the claims of all persons whatsoever—mortgagees as well as everybody else. (Castrique vs. Imrie, Law Rep., 4 H. L., 414; Scott vs. Sherman, 2 Wm. Bl., 977; Hughes vs. Cornelius, 2 Shower, 233; Williams vs. Amroyd, 7 Cranch, 432; Gelston vs. Hoyt, 3 Wheat., 318; 3 Sum., 600; 42 Me., 444; 20 Vt., 85; 35 Miss., 17; 4 La. R., 84; 4 Sandf. Ch., 126.)

And the reason was that all the world were parties or might have been parties if they had seen fit to come in and assert their claims, and if they failed and neglected so to do, they were forever concluded by the decree. Scott vs. Sherman, 2 Wm. Bl., 977, per Mr. Justice Blackstone and foregoing authorities.

And it had also been considered, for nearly three hundred years, that the mortgagee of property which was forfeited to the Crown must make his demand for the money at the exchequer, and not upon the land. (Sir Rowland Haward's case, Goldsborough's R., 137, Pl. 41.)

And in Syndics vs. Nicholson, 4 La. R., 85-6, Judge Porter, in a well-considered opinion, emphatically said:

"By the mortgage every one who could have asserted a right to or in the property libeled was a party to the suit, and the judgment, consequently, is a complete bar to all rights which could have been exercised there. The settled principles of law give to the judgment in rem the authority of the thing judged against all parties to it, that is, against all the world who had a claim to assert on the property. These principles must govern this case, be the consequences what they may."

But the Supreme Court in Day vs. Micon decided that notwithstanding the proceedings under the statute were in rem, the mortgage, which had been erased and canceled under the order of the court, could be enforced against the property; and hence the law, as to the effect of a proceeding in rem under the statute, was found not to be what it had for a long time been supposed it was.

The mistake of the court, then, cannot be said to be the mistake of a well-settled principle of law, so as to bar a purchaser who was injured by the mistake from equitable relief, as the whole difficulty and mistake was occasioned by the obscurity and uncertainty as to the meaning and effect of the language of the statute.

And in Harney vs. Charles, 45 Mo., 157, the supreme court of Missouri held that where an error of law was in part contributed to by the court, the party mistaken was entitled to equitable relief from the consequences of the error. This case is, therefore, a decisive authority in favor of the relief sought by petitioner, as the whole error was not only contributed to, but was actually committed by the court itself, in ordering the property to be sold free of mortgage. See also 41 Ga., 71; 41 Ga., 60.

It would therefore be highly inequitable as well as unjust to visit the consequences of the mistake and error of the court upon the purchaser.

We do not understand the law to be (say both of the Senate committees in their reports on petitioner's claim) that if a court of equity, or any other tribunal, orders and directs the sale of specific property, supposing that it has the right to make such order, and intending to convey a valid title, that if it is made to appear that the court was mistaken, either as to law or fact, so that the purchaser gets nothing by his purchase, it will not refund the purchase-money. See Senate Com. on Claims, (through Senator Jones, of Florida,) Report No. 389, first session Forty-fourth Congress; Senate Com. on Claims, (through Senator Cameron, of Wisconsin,) Rep. 505, second session Forty-fifth Congress.

And says the Senate Committee on Claims, in their report) the right of petitioner to relief is still more clear (if such a thing were possible) by the law of Louisiana.

The Civil Code of Louisiana, article 1846, (Voor. ed., p. 346, paragraph 3.) declares that error of law can never be alleged as the means of acquiring, though it may be invoked as the means of preventing, loss, or of recovering what has been given or paid under such error.

Undoubtedly under this express provision of the Louisiana Code the petitioner would be entitled to relief even if there had been no mistake and no misrepresentation on the part of the Government through its own court.

For the Federal Government recognizes in all its departments the statutes of the several States and the construction given to them by the State courts as constituting rules of decision, except where the Constitution, treaties, and statutes of the United States otherwise expressly provide. (3 Dall., 344; 6 Pet., 291; 13 Pet., 45; 7 How., 1; 11 How., 297; 13 How., 361; 20 How., 1; 22 How., 352; 4 Wall., 203; Rev. Stat. U. S., 136, sec. 721.)

It is therefore manifest that the Louisiana law alone must govern in this case, and not the law of any other State; for there is no such thing as a common law of the United States. In Wheaton vs. Peters, 8 Pet., 653, the court says:

"It is clear there can be no common law of the United States. There is no principle which pervades the Union and has the authority of law that is not embodied in the Constitution and laws of the Union. The common law can be made a part of our Federal system only by legislative adoption. When, therefore, a common-law right is asserted, we must look to the State in which the controversy originated."

There being, then, no common law of the United States, and no such law in Louisiana, and no statute of the United States applicable to the case, petitioner most unquestionably would be entitled to a return of his money under the above provision of the Louisiana law, even if the error of law had been one of his own instead of the error of the court.

But there is another conclusive ground under the Louisiana law (and which, as we have just seen, must govern this case) which entitles the memorialist to the relief sought, and that is, that a purchaser at a judicial sale in Louisiana who is subsequently evicted is entitled to recover back the purchase price.

The Civil Code of Louisiana, article 2621, (page 473, Voor. ed.) is as follows:

"The purchaser, evicted from property purchased under execution, shall have his recourse for reimbursement against the debtor and creditor; but upon the judgment obtained jointly for that purpose, the purchaser shall first take execution against the debtor, and upon the return of such execution no property found, then he shall be at liberty to take out execution against the creditor."

And in Louisiana the law imposes and attaches a warranty, as a legal consequence, to all sales, judicial as well as conventional, without any stipulation to that effect; and a purchaser at a judicial sale, even if he knows there is danger of eviction at the time of the purchase, can recover back the purchase price unless he has expressly bought at his own risk and peril, and excluded his right of recovery by a stipulation of non-warranty. (13 Louisiana Annual R., 331; 7 ib., 361; 9 ib., 297; 10 ib., 137, 139; 3 ib., 327; 5 ib., 314.)

In Scott vs. Featherston (5 Louisiana Annual Reports, 314) the court, in answer to the objections that the purchaser at a judicial sale was aware of the dangers of eviction when he purchased (the property being then in litigation) and that he, therefore, took the risk and was not entitled to warranty and a return of the price, said:

"To these propositions we cannot assent. The sheriff's sale to Collier is in the usual form, and carries with it, of course, the usual warranties of such instruments. The knowledge which purchasers have of the danger of eviction does not deprive them of the right of claiming the return of the price after the eviction has taken place. The right exists in all cases, unless the party evicted, knowing the danger of eviction, took the property without warranty and at his peril and risk." (C. C. 2481; C. P., 711.)

And this rule is founded on the express provisions of the Civil Code, "and on the moral maxim of the law," "that no one ought to enrich himself at the expense of another." (Civil Code, arts. 2505, 1965, Voor. ed.)

And the same rule is recognized in the common law.

In Valle's Heirs vs. Fleming's Heirs, 29 Mo., 157, the court well says:

"The maxim of the common law, 'nemo debet locupletari ex alterius incommodo,' is one of those general principles of natural equity which receive at once, without examination or discussion, the approbation of every cultivated and well-regulated mind."

It is therefore manifest that petitioner under the Louisiana law is entitled to a return of his money. And it is equally manifest that the Louisiana law alone must govern the case. Indeed, it has not even been pretended or suggested by any one but that petitioner, under the Louisiana law, is entitled to a return of his money, and that the Louisiana law must govern the case, as there is no common law of the United States and no common law of Louisiana, and no statute of the United States applicable to the case. And this view of the case is clearly and distinctly taken and maintained in all the reports of the different committees.

The right of petitioner, therefore, to a return of his money is clear and unquestionable.

And not only is petitioner entitled to a return of his money under the Louisiana law, but he is entitled to its return in any and every other view of the case.

As to the pretense that petitioner had constructive notice of the mortgage, that is a matter which can furnish no excuse or reason to the Government for not repaying petitioner his money, as the doctrine of constructive notice is wholly inapplicable as between vendor and vendee. (Parham vs. Randolph, 4 How., (Miss.) 435, 451; Young vs. Harris, 2 Ala., 113; Brown vs. Rice's Adm., 26 Gratt., 474; 6 Paig., 203; 6 Yerg., 108; Senate Com. on Claims rep., No. 505, second session Forty-fifth Congress.)

But even if the petitioner had been aware of the defectiveness of the Government's title, the Government would be bound to make its warranty of the title good—bound to refund the purchase price. For it is well settled:

"If the vendor contract to deduce a good title to the premises sold, it affords no reason for his not performing that contract that the purchaser was aware, at the time of the sale, that the title was defective." (Chitty on Cont., 430, 11th ed., and note; Burnett vs. Wheeler, 7 M. and W., 364; Swan vs. Drury, 22 Pick., 485.)

In Carpenter vs. Bailly, 17 Wend., 244, the court, after a most careful and thorough examination of the authorities, said:

"Where a man buys a piece of land and covenants for a conveyance in general terms, the presumption is that he expects the title, and the grantor should be required to give him a perfect title."

In Swan vs. Drury, 22 Pick., 485, Wilde, J., says:

"The agreement was to convey the farm, which must be construed as an agreement to convey a good title free from all incumbrances, and parol evidence to show that the purchaser at the time of the contract was aware that the farm was subject to a mortgage was rejected, as it constituted no defense to the action."

And to the same effect are the following authorities: 2 Rich., 364; 13 N. Hamp., 167; 2 Hen. & Munf., 164.

In Hill vs. Hobert, 16 Me., 164, there was a contract to make and execute "a good and sufficient deed to convey the title to the premises," and this was held not to be performed unless a good title to the land passed by the deed.

Shepley, J., in the above case, well says:

"The rule in equity is clear and well established requiring a perfect title to be made, unless the contrary has been agreed. A person is never supposed to be desirous of purchasing a lawsuit or a title attended with doubt and vexation, instead of one upon which he can quietly repose."

And where the contract stipulates for the conveyance of the land or estate or for the title to it, performance can be made only by the conveyance of a good title. (Sug. V. & P., 430 in note, 11th ed.)

It is therefore seen that it will not do to say that the Government could only seize, condemn, and sell Judah P. Benjamin's interest, whatever that might be, subject to the mortgage, and that petitioner got all the Government could sell. For the right of petitioner to relief does not depend upon what the Government could do, but upon what it undertook and assumed to do.

Had the Government sold only such right and interest in the property as Benjamin possessed, subject to the mortgage, as a matter of course petitioner would have no claim whatever for a return of his money; but the Government did no such thing, as fully appears from all the reports and the judicial record of the proceedings which is filed in the case. Now, it not only fully appears from said reports and proceedings that the two squares of ground were seized and libeled as the property of Judah P. Benjamin—it not only appears that a default was entered and a pro confesso taken after due and legal notice to all parties in interest to appear and defend their rights in the property seized (and which default was a judicial admission and establishment by the record of all the facts charged in the libel (Miller vs. United States, 11 Wall., 301, 303, 304; 12 Minn., 221; 6 Fost., 247; 6 J. Ch., 565; 18 Iowa, 469; 13 Ohio St., 354; 22 Iowa, 32.) but the court expressly found and declared in the judgment of condemnation (Supreme Court Rec., 31-2) that the two squares of ground were the property of Judah P. Benjamin and accordingly ordered that the two squares of ground, and not merely any interest which Judah P. Benjamin might have had in the same, should be sold, and that the two squares of ground themselves were, in pursuance of said order, sold and conveyed to petitioner, to have and to hold the same to him and his heirs forever.

Indeed, it has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court of the United States that the property was divested out of the former owner and vested in the Government by the decree of condemnation, and that when the Government sold the property it sold it as its own, and did not sell it as property in which the former owner had any interest or concern. (Semmes vs. United States, 1 Otto, 26; Confiscation Cases, 20 Wall., 112, 113.)

Now, whilst all this did not, according to the decision of the Supreme Court in Day vs. Micou, preclude the mortgagees from enforcing their mortgage against the property, yet it most assuredly precludes the Government from saying that it did not condemn and sell the property itself to petitioner. Besides, the deed from the Government is a deed to the property itself, the two squares of ground, with a warranty of the title, and the Government, by accepting the proceeds of the sale, has ratified and adopted the whole transaction, and is bound to make the warranty of the title good; bound to return the purchase price, as the law will not allow a party, as we have seen, to take the proceeds of even an unauthorized transaction and repudiate the obligation which the transaction imposes.

But the most unfounded of all the pretenses that have been suggested for not repaying petitioner his money is the covert insinuation or suggestion that the Supreme Court has decided against petitioner's right. Now, the Supreme Court has done no such thing, as the right of petitioner to be repaid his money was in no way or manner presented or involved in the case before that court.

The sole and only question in the case before the court was as to the right of the mortgagees to enforce the mortgage against the property which the Government had sold to petitioner free from incumbrance and with a warranty of the title. And as the court held that the mortgage was enforceable against the property, notwithstanding the judicial proceedings of the United States against the same, the judgment enforcing the mortgage was a judgment of eviction, and the right of petitioner to the relief he seeks results from the eviction. The judgment of the Supreme Court is, therefore, the highest evidence of the right of petitioner to the relief which he asks, as it shows the failure of the title and the eviction of the purchaser.

And there are many cases, as shown in the Senate committee's report, in which the Government has refunded the purchase price of property where the Government had no title or the title had failed. (Senate Committee on Claims rep., No. 505, second session Forty-fifth Congress, page 13.)

Your committee, while unanimously concurring to report favorably upon this claim, in view of the special circumstances developed in its proof, they do not wish their action to be understood in the light of a precedent, in all cases, for holding the Government responsible for defects in the titles of marshals or other executive officers of the Government.

Your committee are, therefore, clearly of opinion that as the Government, through its officers, sold and conveyed the property itself to petitioner free from mortgage and with a warranty of the title, but which title was defective and has wholly failed, and the purchaser has been evicted from the property, the Government is, on every principle of law, justice, and in good conscience, bound to return to petitioner the purchase price; and accordingly report the accompanying bill and recommend the passage of the same.

During the reading of the report, and before its conclusion, Mr. BREWER said: I called for the reading of the report. So far as I am concerned I do not want to hear any more of it read.

Mr. WHITE. Go ahead with the reading; I want to hear it.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report.

Mr. BARBER. The remainder of this report is devoted entirely to a brief of the legal questions involved. I suggest that the reading of the remainder of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. SPARKS. I object to that.

Mr. WHITE. No gentleman has a right to withdraw my objection to dispensing with the reading of the report.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. My point of order is that the hour allotted to the gentleman submitting this report has expired.

Mr. BROWNE. That point is well taken, I think.

Mr. PRICE. And I hope the Chair will sustain it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that the hour rule runs against a report of a committee. The further reading of the report can be waived by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHITE. I called for the reading of the report and I want it read. We are just approaching a very interesting portion of the report and I do not think the reading of it should be omitted.

Mr. BROWNE. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of this report. It covers twenty octavo printed pages, and a fourth of it is still left to be read. I ask that the reading of the remainder of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. BUCKNER. I object.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the report.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the committee now rise. This bill will come up the next time we go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I hope that motion will not be agreed to.

Mr. BROWNE. The reading of the report is nearly completed; let us have all of it.

Mr. WHITE. I ask that the further reading of the report be dispensed with.

Mr. FISHER. I object; let us have the whole of it now.

Mr. BELTZHOVER. I also object.

The Clerk then resumed and concluded the reading of the report, as above.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the patience of the Committee of the Whole has been so sorely taxed, as has been apparent from the manifestations on all sides, in consequence of the extreme length of this report. I am not disposed to press the further consideration of the case at this moment if the impatience of members extends to such a degree that they desire the committee shall rise. But, Mr. Chairman, as the case is now before the Committee of the Whole, I will ask that it be considered and acted upon—that we come to a vote upon it. It is a very simple case, though it has been very elaborately argued in the report. If the committee will bear with me I will make a very brief statement which will place the matter beyond the possibility of controversy in the mind of any lawyer upon this floor.

Mr. HERBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I prefer to have the bill acted upon now.

Mr. Chairman, this is the fifth report which has been made on this case; and the report which I have had the honor to submit to the House passed the Committee on Claims without a single dissenting voice. The case is simply this: In the year 1865 the United States Government under the confiscation act of July 17, 1862, libeled two squares of ground in the city of New Orleans, Louisiana, as the property of Judah P. Benjamin, and issued a monition to the whole world calling upon all parties who claimed or proposed to set up any interest in this property to come forward by a designated day and set forth whatever right, title, or interest they might have therein. The day specified in the monition came around, and the district court of the United States of Louisiana condemned and forfeited this property to the United States Government.

Subsequently, under the act of July 17, 1862, and the authority conferred by that act, the district court of Louisiana passed an order requiring the marshal, the executive officer of the Government, before he sold any property which was condemned and forfeited under this act of the United States, to have erased, canceled, and removed from the record any incumbrance or lien whatever upon such property, in order that the marshal might make a complete and valid title to the purchaser thereof. Under that order the marshal proceeded; and upon the day of sale he arose at the auction and announced to be sold two squares of ground in the city of New Orleans; he did not announce as for sale the interest of Judah P. Benjamin therein. The Government of the United States sold two squares of ground as its property, sold the specific thing, so announced it, and the marshal proclaimed at the sale that he would give to the purchaser thereof a good and valid title, would deliver to him a title deed in which should be incorporated a certificate from the recording officer of deeds in Louisiana that any mortgage or lien upon that property was erased and canceled. The marshal proceeded to sell, and the property was knocked down to L. Madison Day for the sum of $5,400. The marshal handed to Day the deed, and in the body of it was incorporated a certificate from the recorder of mortgages that a mortgage for $10,000 held by one Micou upon the square of ground is hereby erased and canceled. That deed with that certificate incorporated therein was handed by the marshal to Mr. Day, and Day paid his money.

What next? When Day had come into possession of the property he spent $4,000 in order to put it in a condition to be a habitation for his family, making the property cost him over $9,000. He remained in possession from 1865 until 1872, when Mr. Micou, the holder of the mortgage which had been erased and canceled by the recorder of mortgages and the certificate of cancellation of which had been incorporated in the title deed held by Mr. Day, filed proceedings for the foreclosure of his mortgage in the State court of Louisiana; and the court decided that the title which Mr. Day held was not a good title superior to the right of Mr. Micou, the mortgagee. An appeal was taken from that to the Supreme Court of the United States, and Day was evicted by the decree of foreclosure in favor of Micou, mortgagee.

Mr. HOUSE. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire how that mortgage was canceled?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It was canceled by the recorder of mortgages for the parish and city of New Orleans, Louisiana.

Mr. HOUSE. Did the recorder pay the mortgagee his money?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir; he did not pay the money; but we have nothing to do with that. What has Mr. Day to do with that? I ask you as a lawyer if you had bought that property, and the lawyer who examined the title for you had said there was no mortgage standing upon record against it, would you come back upon the lawyer if a mortgage canceled upon record should prove not to have been paid?

Mr. HOUSE. Was not the mortgage recorded?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly; but Day never saw the mortgage. Day says the certificate of the recorder had been canceled.

Mr. HOUSE. Was not the mortgage recorded?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSE. Was not that record notice to the world under the laws of Louisiana?

Mr. O'CONNOR. So was the cancellation and erasure notice to the world.

Mr. BELTZHOVER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly.

Mr. BELTZHOVER. At this sale by the Government there were two squares of ground sold. For one this man paid $5,400, and on that there was a mortgage of $10,000.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir; and that property he lost.

Mr. BELTZHOVER. How much did he pay for the other square, and how much is it worth, or how much did he sell it for?

Mr. O'CONNOR. There was no evidence before the Committee that Day bought anything but one square of ground.

Mr. BELTZHOVER. Oh, yes! Your report on page 2 shows that there were two squares sold; it is stated specifically that this man purchased two squares, and that the one for which he paid $5,400 was lost by reason of the foreclosure of the mortgage. Now, I want to know what he paid for the other, and how much it was worth, or how much he sold it for.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will state that has nothing to do with the case.

Mr. BELTZHOVER. It has.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly.

Mr. BELTZHOVER. If I understand this case the gentleman has in his way the rule of caveat emptor and he wants to get around it by appealing to the equities. If this gentleman in purchasing two squares made enough on the one he retained to cover this $5,400, then he has no equity.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But he has not; there is no proof of that.

Mr. WILLITS. Do you know he has not?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That question was never submitted to me, as a matter of fact, but that has nothing to do with the case, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BUCKNER. I understand, then, the United States to have decided the mortgage to be satisfied and canceled.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And canceled.

Mr. BUCKNER. I want to ask whether under the law giving the court power to carry out this confiscation—whether upon such proceeding of confiscation the court had power to do that thing.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The claimant here has nothing to do with the power of the court. Whether the court has power to do it or not is the same to him.

Mr. BUCKNER. The court has no power except what it has under authority of law. If it went beyond that, then the purchaser must look out.

Mr. O'CONNOR. When the Government ratifies the act of the court, and receives the purchaser's money, I should like to ask the gentleman how in equity or good conscience he can claim that the Government should hold the money. It is justifying robbery.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Is there any evidence the United States got this money?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly it has; it is in the Treasury to-day.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The report does not state it. How was that mortgage canceled? Who got the money when the mortgage was satisfied?

Mr. O'CONNOR. They got the property. The United States libeled the property and condemned it.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. But the mortgagee did not pay.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The mortgagee got the property, when he sold subsequently and when he evicted Day.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. He did not get this money.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The United States got this money, and he, Day, got nothing for it.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The Government undertook to close out that mortgage.

Mr. O'CONNOR. No; it did not. The court did nothing but undertake to condemn and sell this property as the property of Judah P. Benjamin.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. But listen to my question: The Government undertook to cancel the mortgage of the mortgagee, who was no party to the record?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Did not the claimant know that necessarily was void?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No; he did not.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Then he was a fool.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is the very thing before Congress; that is the equity of his case.

Mr. BARBER. Allow me to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly.

Mr. BARBER. The court was proceeding on the theory it had the right to seize and condemn this real estate in precisely the same way it would seize and condemn a bale of cotton; that the publication of its monition was a notice to all the world that upon the failure of the mortgagee to appear and assert his rights in answer to that monition he would be in default and his rights cut off by the decree of pro confesso.

Mr. WILLITS. Was that order of the court of discharge perfected?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield the floor to the gentleman for a question, but I should much prefer the House would allow me to get through with the statement of my case.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman yield to a motion to rise?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir; let me get through with my statement of my case, and, then, if any gentleman desires to ask me a question, I will be glad to answer it.

I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the rule of caveat emptor cannot and does not apply in this case. I would ask the House to bear in mind that when the Government sold this property it did not advertise to sell the right, title, and interest of Judah P. Benjamin; but it had condemned and forfeited the property and sold the specific property itself and the authorities are complete in law and in equity that no party can undertake to sell to anybody a thing to which he has no title or right, and then claim to keep the money he has got thereby, and which he unjustly retains in his possession.

Mr. WILLITS. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly; but one at a time.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina whether the committee had before them the process issued to the marshal, by virtue of which this property was sold?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir; all the proceedings are printed in the transcript of the record from the Supreme Court in the case of Day and Micou. They are in the papers at the Clerk's desk. I would also state to the House that the proof in the case shows by witnesses who were produced in Louisiana that the $5,400 for which this property was sold was the full market value of it.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Then I would like to ask the gentleman another question—whether in any report heretofore made by any committee they have quoted the laws of Louisiana as establishing the right of the petitioner to recover; and whether it is his position that the laws of Louisiana could give or take away any right named in an act of Congress alone?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Then can the State of Louisiana by any statute of the State take away the right of a party under an act of Congress when the proceedings have been entirely under and by virtue of the act of Congress?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is perfectly irrelevant here. Under the code of Louisiana the law is conclusive as to the right of the party.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. No, sir; the law of the land has given this petitioner the right.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the mortgage was a standing mortgage in spite of its cancellation. The Government of the United States levied on the property and it was sold by the marshal, and the Government has the money in its vaults. By what right of equity can it keep it?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. But I am not speaking of the equities of the case, sir. You may show quite an equitable case, but does it help the equities of the case to quote a law of Louisiana as between parties or citizens purchasing under the United States?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly; because in the United States courts the laws of the State where cases arise are for that case the laws for that court.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Iowa. Yes; but only as to the practice; not to rights and remedies.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I beg the gentleman's pardon; even as to the substantive proposition involved, the law of Louisiana is the only law. There is no common law of the United States. There is no statute law of the United States by which this case can be governed. [Cries of "You are right!"]

Mr. WILLITS. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLITS. Was there attached to this marshal's deed a certificate of the proper officer showing the erasure and cancellation of this mortgage?

Mr. O'CONNOR. There is, and it is at the Clerk's desk among the papers.

Mr. WILLITS. That was a discharge in accordance with the order of the court, was it?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir; the order of the court.

Mr. WILLITS. What evidence have we that was not a proper discharge?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The Supreme Court has so decided.

Mr. WILLITS. But the Supreme Court did not decide that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It did decide this, that the mere notice to the parties, that the monition of the court did not oblige them to come in and cut off their remedies under the mortgage.

Mr. WILLITS. But the Supreme Court did not give a valid discharge to the mortgage.

Mr. O'CONNOR. But the court ordered the mortgage to be canceled, vacated, or satisfied, if you please.

Mr. WILLITS. Who signed the discharge?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It was signed by the recorder of mortgages in Louisiana.

Mr. WILLITS. At whose behest?

Mr. O'CONNOR. By order of the United States court.

Mr. WILLITS. That does not appear here.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It does appear.

Mr. WILLITS. What part?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Under the order of the district court of the United States at Louisiana.

Mr. WILLITS. There is nothing in the report which would indicate that it was anything but the discharge of the party holding the mortgage.

Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir; discharged by order of the district judge of the district of Louisiana.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a few words more to say.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Certainly.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I wish to ask whether the deed conveying the title of the Government contained a warranty of title.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It simply recited this, and if the gentleman and the House will listen to me they will see I am perfectly right. It is simply a conveyance to L. Madison Day, his heirs and assigns, forever, and under the law of Louisiana those words carry a warranty with them. I have authorities piled Pelion on Ossa showing that at a judicial sale, under the law of that State, a title simply reciting a conveyance "to A B and his heirs and assigns forever" carries with it a warranty.

Mr. ATHERTON. Does that doctrine in Louisiana or anywhere else apply to a judicial sale?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir; under the civil code of Louisiana it is expressly applicable. The law provides that a purchaser evicted from property purchased under execution shall have his recourse for reimbursement against the debtor and creditor.

Mr. ATHERTON. Please refer me to the authority.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow me to ask him a question in that same connection?

Mr. ATHERTON. Let the gentleman from South Carolina first give me the reference I have asked for.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman will find it on page 17 of my report:

The Civil Code of Louisiana, article 2621, (page 473, Voor. ed.) is as follows: "The purchaser, evicted from property purchased under execution, shall have his recourse for reimbursement against the debtor and creditor; but upon the judgment obtained jointly for that purpose, the purchaser shall first take execution against the debtor, and upon the return of such execution no property found, then he shall be at liberty to take out execution against the creditor."

Mr. HUTCHINS. Will the gentleman from South Carolina permit me to call his attention to what is stated in the report? The report certainly sets out, page 2, that this party had purchased the property "from the Government, free from incumbrance and with a clause of warranty in the deed."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir; and the clause of warranty to which I alluded is the clause which under the laws of Louisiana is a warranty.

Mr. HUTCHINS. But is it in the deed?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; because in the deed the words "heirs and assigns forever" carry a warranty according to the laws of Louisiana.

Mr. PHILIPS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. PHILIPS. What have the provisions of the civil code of Louisiana, referred to by the gentleman, to do with the case when the whole mode of procedure and the character of the deed to be made by the marshal in proceedings under this statute of confiscation are prescribed in express terms by the Federal statute itself? This is a proceeding under the United States statute.

Mr. O'CONNOR. To what portion of the statute does the gentleman refer?

Mr. PHILIPS. I read from 12 United States Statutes at Large, page 591, section 8:

That the several courts aforesaid shall have power to make such orders, establish such forms of decree and sale, and direct such deeds and conveyances to be executed and delivered by the marshals thereof where real estate shall be the subject of sale as shall fitly and efficiently effect the purposes of this act and vest in the purchasers of such property good and valid titles thereto.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a question of order. There is so much confusion in the Hall it is impossible to hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will come to order.

Mr. WHITE. As it is manifest the bill cannot be passed to-day, I move that the committee rise.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have the floor and do not yield for that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina will proceed.

Mr. WHITE. Am I not recognized?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not recognized to make the motion, as the gentleman from South Carolina is on the floor.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I believe, Mr. Chairman, I have stated all the facts that are necessary to enable the House to come to a decision upon this bill. I only desire to say, in conclusion, that there is not a code upon the civilized globe which would uphold a doctrine that would justify the Government of the United States any more than an individual in selling to a party that which it did not have, which it did not possess, taking from him his money and holding that money in its vaults.

Mr. Chairman, this is a fraud upon the purchaser, no more and no less, and if this House should sanction it by voting down the bill for the relief of L. Madison Day, they will vote it down without the sanction of any recognized principle in law or morals in any code upon earth. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address the committee upon this case, but I do not wish to occupy its time now if it be more agreeable to the committee to rise. I am informed, however, that if the committee should rise now, on the next day for the consideration of private business the reading of the report can be forced upon the committee again by one member calling for its reading. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The report has been read and the bill is now under consideration.

Mr. ELLIS. I am satisfied the bill cannot be disposed of this evening and if the gentleman from Georgia will yield to me I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Louisiana to make that motion?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I am willing to yield for that motion; but gentlemen around me say that we had better go on and finish the bill.

Mr. ELLIS. It will take you longer than you think.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia will proceed or yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman to make his motion to test the sense of the committee.

Mr. ELLIS. Then I move that the committee do now rise.

The question being put; there were—ayes 50, noes 60.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I had not known that this case was to be before the Committee of the Whole House to-day until the reading of the report was nearly half through. It arrested my attention by reason of what I regarded as the strange legal position on which it is bottomed.

The case plainly stated is this: A man, at a judicial sale, bought a piece of property, took an ordinary deed in which there is not one word looking to warranty, and now comes and says the doctrine of caveat emptor does not apply to him and the Government should pay back the proceeds of that sale. Not having known, as I have said, that the case was coming up, I cannot do more than simply draw upon my memory for familiar authority upon the proposition. I have before me 9 Wheaton's Reports in the Monte Allegre case, and at page 645 I read:

Nor can the marshal, or auctioneer, while acting within the scope of their authority, be considered, in any respect whatever, as warranting the property sold. The marshal, from the nature of the transaction, must be ignorant of the particular state and condition of the property. He is the mere minister of the law, to execute the order of the court; and a due discharge of his duty does not require more than that he should give to purchasers a fair opportunity of examining and informing themselves of the nature and condition of the property offered for sale.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Does that case apply to this, where the marshal proclaimed at the sale that he would sell the property free from incumbrance and with a warranty title?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. The gentleman says this case is taken out of the rule by reason of certain facts, to wit: that the court undertook by its order to confiscate a mortgage over which it had no jurisdiction under the statute, a mortgage belonging to a party who had no notice of the proceeding; and that because the court passed that void judgment, and its marshal said at the sale "I intend to execute that void judgment," therefore the law is changed.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Was it just for the Government, then, to ratify that sale and hold the money?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I will answer the whole argument of the gentleman. The Government has ratified nothing. The doctrine of ratification applies only between principal and agent; and a marshal selling property at a judicial sale is in no sense the agent of the Government.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I will.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. Suppose that the judgment on which this sale was made had been reversed on appeal; would this applicant then have had any right to the money he paid?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. No; not a particle.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. He gets his title under a judgment, and that judgment is appealed from. The United States cannot sustain the judgment and it is reversed and rendered void. Would not restitution be ordered?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. No. The whole doctrine of this report is that there was a warranty when in fact there was none; that the marshal conducting the sale was the agent of the United States when in fact he was not such agent. The foundation falling, the superstructure must fall.

Now, I want to call attention to another fact. The gentleman concedes here that if this man's mortgage had never come up against the property then they would have been satisfied with the sale.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The applicant would then have had no claim.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. He would have had no claim but for the fact that the mortgage came up against him, you admit. By the very case which the gentleman cites, but does not quote, he would have then been exactly in the same situation as to title. The wrong he complains of is eviction from the property. This very decision holds that he had no title under the sale, even apart from that mortgage, and that the eviction was a necessity. I read from the case of Day vs. Micon, 18 Wallace, cited in the gentleman's report. I never read it until to-day, since the reading of this report commenced. Mr. Justice Strong delivered the opinion of the court. He said:

Most of the questions in this case were settled adversely to the claims of the plaintiff in error by our decision of Bigelow vs. Forrest, 9 Wallace R. We then determined that under the act of Congress of July 17, 1862, known as the "confiscation act," and the joint resolution of the same date explanatory thereof, only the life estate of the person for whose offense the land had been seized was subject to condemnation and sale. We also determined that nothing more was within the jurisdiction or judicial power of the district court, and that consequently a decree condemning the fee could have no greater effect than to subject the life estate to sale. This in effect disposes of the case.

So they decided, before coming to the question of mortgage at all, that the party had no rights in the land. Why? Because there was a decree against the fee, when the court had no jurisdiction over the fee. It is exactly as if the marshal had levied upon the fee when he had no right to levy upon anything but the life estate; and in that case, as every lawyer knows, the life estate would not pass.

A MEMBER. The fee would not pass.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Neither the fee nor the life estate would pass. The marshal must sell what he levies upon. If the thing he advertises and sets up for sale does not pass, then nothing else passes. That is well understood by every man who has investigated the matter of sheriffs' and marshals' sales.

It is replied here that by virtue of some law in Louisiana a purchaser at an ordinary judicial sale, out of which he acquires no title, and from the land purchased at that sale he is evicted, may come upon the plaintiff or the defendant and get back his money. They say that is the law there. I do not know whether it is so or not. But assume it to be so, how is the United States bound by that State law? The United States is bound by the common law of England and by the statutes of the Congress of the United States. It has naught to do with the law of the several States except where by congressional action those State laws are made part of the laws of the United States, such as our practice act and things of that character.

It is replied here that the United States cannot honestly keep this money. Why not? It said to the man, "I propose to sell the property of Judah P. Benjamin. There is the record; you can go and examine whether I have a good judgment against it or not. I propose to sell it free from incumbrance. You can look at the State's records and you will find a mortgage on it. Look in my records and you will find that the mortgage is in favor of a man who is not a party to my record. You know that it is a mere brutum fulmen to talk about canceling his claim; he is not before me."

Now the man under those circumstances buys the property, is evicted from it, and then comes into court and says, "I want my money back." Why? "Because I was foolish enough to pay it for property to which I could not acquire a title."

Now, the law says that you must take care when you are buying; you must examine and see if there is a valid judgment; see if the defendant has a title. If you do not see that he has one, then you must take all the chances.

Another point: Suppose this property had been worth $100,000. I do not know how much it was worth. It appears to have been considered good security for $10,000, because there was a mortgage on it to that amount. This man bought the property for $5,400. I have no doubt he thought he was making a splendid speculation out of a man who went away from his country and left his property. He took his chances, as every purchaser does.

If you adopt the doctrine of this bill, then the United States will have to pay back all the money received for lands sold in South Carolina at tax sales. The United States Supreme Court has held that as to the surplus of the money received at those sales, over and above the taxes, the Government was the trustee for the real owner of the land; but it held on to the taxes.

If the principle of this bill is right the United States ought also to pay back the taxes. What is more, they ought to hold themselves liable as on a warranty of the title to every man who bought at one of these void tax sales and pay him the value of the land from which he has been evicted. That is the inexorable logic of this report. I have no more to say.

Mr. OSMER. Will the gentleman answer one question?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. OSMER. As I understand the gentleman predicates his proposition upon the common law of England. But I would remind him that in Louisiana the Code Napoleon prevails. I desire to know whether the gentleman has taken note of the difference in the rule of law pertaining to titles in this respect?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I will answer the gentleman in this way: It would be improper for me to pretend that I understand anything about the peculiar law of Louisiana on this subject; I do not; I have never investigated it in regard to this proposition. But I take the report as stating it most strongly in favor of the claim which that report supports; and the report only makes a case between an ordinary plaintiff and defendant—the case of a purchaser at an ordinary judicial sale.

Mr. O'CONNOR. No, sir; this is an extraordinary case.

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Very well; call it extraordinary. I call all judicial sales ordinary cases. But here is the point: by what authority, by what dictum in the books, can you establish a rule of liability in favor of a purchaser at a judicial sale in Louisiana—a rule to bind money of the United States in the Treasury; to bind Congress to put its hands in there, take out the money and deliver it over to a man who under the common law and United States statutes has no right to it?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I ask the gentleman to answer me this simple question, not as before a court which is to decide according to technical rules of procedure, but as before the American Congress sitting as a high court of equity: It being admitted that the Government of the United States has now in its Treasury $5,400 of this man's money for which it has given him nothing, for which it gave him a piece of paper which has proved to be void, upon what principle of law, moral or otherwise, can the gentleman contend that the Government of the United States has a right to hold that money?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. I will answer the gentleman's question by a denial of his proposition. The United States did give Day something. It gave him authority to take all he could get under that sale—neither more nor less—accompanied by possession.

Now, the gentleman bases his inquiry upon the ground of some special equity. I am pleased to be able to answer him in the language of the Supreme Court on that proposition. The same plea was set up in this case of the Monte Allegre, from which I have already quoted:

The appellant had it, therefore, in his power to obtain the same information with respect to the condition of the tobacco, if he had thought it worth while to give himself the trouble. So that whatever loss he has sustained is attributable solely to his own negligence, without the fault or misconduct of any one; and the law will not, and ought not, to afford him redress.

So much for the law. I read farther on in the same opinion:

The principle, if well founded, cannot depend upon the contingency whether or not the proceeds shall happen to remain in court until the defect in the article sold is discovered.

In that case it was said "this money is impounded in a court of justice; I bought at your sale under your decree; I got no title; are you going to turn my money over to the plaintiff when you gave me no title? I admit that if you had paid over the money I could not get it back; but you have it still in your custody. I ask you to take the money and hand it back to me, and leave matters in statu quo." The court negated that demand. It said:

If the proceeds are liable, they ought to be followed into the hands of the owner after distribution; and if they cannot be reached, the remedy ought to be in personam. Such is the end to which the doctrine must inevitably lead, if well founded. But it is presumed no one would push it so far.

The Supreme Court in 1824 could not imagine that the Congress of the United States in 1880 would support a bill on any such ground.

The language of the court is:

There is no rule in courts of equity to sanction what is now asked for on the part of this appellant.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, as I intend to reply in this case before the vote is taken, I yield now to the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. ELLIS.]

Mr. ELLIS. I desire to speak upon this case, but my lungs are in such condition that I can hardly make myself heard this evening. I would therefore prefer that the committee rise.

Mr. REED. Before the committee rises, I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. O'CONNOR] what the value of this property was, provided there had been a good title.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman will find by the transcript of the proceedings in the case of Day vs. Micou that witnesses who were examined upon this point proved that $5,400 was the full market value of the property, free of all incumbrance, at the day of sale.

Mr. REED. Notwithstanding there was a mortgage of $10,000?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It was sold free of the mortgage of $10,000. Besides, Mr. Day actually paid out of his pocket over $4,000 for repairs upon the property.

Mr. BARBER. The mortgage was ante bellum.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The mortgage had been given before the war.

Mr. REED. When was the valuation taken?

Mr. O'CONNOR. At the time of the sale by the United States marshal—at the time Day bought.

Mr. GIBSON. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the long report which has been read this evening may not be published in the RECORD, as it will simply encumber its pages.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter for the House to determine.

The motion of Mr. GIBSON that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McLANE reported that the Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had under consideration the Private Calendar, and particularly a bill (H. R. No. 2798) for the relief of L. Madison Day, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. KENNA, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 68) to authorize the printing of 13,000 copies of the Report on Sheep Husbandry; and

An act (H. R. No. 3559) for the relief of L. H. Hershfield & Brother.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 27, 1880.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. SAMUEL DOMER, pastor of Saint Paul's English Lutheran church, Washington, District of Columbia.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SCALES. I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman.

Mr. SCALES. I desire to make a report from the Committee on Indian Affairs in reference to resolutions referred to them calling for departmental information.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I move to dispense with the morning hour with a view to proceeding in Committee of the Whole with the further consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi in a moment. The gentleman from North Carolina, chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, has a proposition which is recognized under the rules as being in order at any time, it being the report of that committee on resolutions referred to it calling for departmental information. Of course if the gentleman from Mississippi insists upon his motion to suspend the rules the Chair will first submit that question to the House.

Mr. SCALES. If the gentleman will permit me for a moment I think he will not object, as it will take but an instant to dispose of this.

Mr. ATKINS. Is not Monday set apart for that character of business?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes this report in accordance with the rules from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BREWER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. ATKINS. If the House does not address itself to the consideration and discussion of the appropriation bills we will be here until August.

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Speaker, this is the third time I have endeavored to make this report from the committee.

FRAUDS CONNECTED WITH INDIAN AGENCIES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from North Carolina should be allowed to make this report. It is simply a resolution calling for information, and he is entitled to report at any time under the rules. The Chair will immediately thereafter recognize the gentleman from Mississippi. This report is made in accordance with the same privilege which the Committee on Printing possesses, and which the gentleman from Mississippi is familiar with. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be instructed to report to this House whether there have been, since July 1, 1877, any frauds or corrupt practices on the part of any of the inspectors, agents, employes, or any other persons connected with the Indian service at the agencies or elsewhere in said service, and, if any, to report the places where committed, the nature of the offense, and whether any have been removed or otherwise punished for said offenses.

The resolution was adopted.

UTE INDIAN OUTBREAK.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to this House at an early day a copy of the testimony taken by Generals Hatch and Adams, special agents of that Department, touching the late outbreak of the Ute Indians in the State of Colorado.

The resolution was adopted.

PURCHASE OF BONDS BY TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means calling for information from the Treasury Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to furnish this House with a detailed statement of the amount of bonds purchased by the Treasury between the 1st of January, 1844, and the 1st of January, 1859, setting forth the date and amount of each purchase, the rate of interest borne by the bonds then purchased, with the date of the maturity thereof, and the total premium, exclusive of accrued interest, paid on each purchase, and its rate per cent.

The resolution was agreed to.

PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I rise to a question of personal privilege affecting the dignity of this House and the integrity of its proceedings.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I find in the New York Evening Post, printed last evening, an article headed "A Cowardly Congress." That article, after referring to the action of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSEND] in causing the reference of the bill affecting legislation upon laws providing for the collection of import duties to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws instead of to the Committee on Ways and Means, to which it should have been appropriately referred, as the article alleges, goes on to say:

If the House of Representatives had determined to go to work in a direct and honest way in the matter, all that was needed was the adoption of a resolution directing the committee to report forthwith one of the tariff bills, say the sugar bill.

Here is a direct charge that this House is working in an indirect and dishonest way because it does not adopt a resolution directing that committee to report a tariff bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman consider that a question of privilege?

Mr. HUTCHINS. Undoubtedly; it is a question affecting the dignity and integrity of the proceedings of the House, and I regard it as a question of the very highest privilege that can be raised.

Mr. BURROWS. I rise to a point of order. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I have a note from the Clerk of this House in relation to the introduction and adoption of resolutions—

Mr. BURROWS. I insist that that is not a question of privilege. The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see that the gentleman has so far indicated a question of privilege. It appears to be a question of free speech.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I claim that it is a question of privilege, and of the very highest kind.

Mr. BURROWS. I insist upon my point of order.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. I hope he will allow me to proceed. He has been heard on this floor many times, and this is the second time I have asked to be heard. Now, I claim the right to be heard on this question. I was proceeding to say that I have a note here from the Clerk of this House—

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot see that this is a question of privilege under the rule.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I hope the Chair will permit me to proceed, and I will indicate that this is a question of the very highest privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will conform to the rules of this House.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Certainly I will.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] rose to a question of order. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BURROWS. I make the point of order that under the rules the question stated by the gentleman from New York is not a question of privilege.

Mr. HUTCHINS. I only want to make one statement. That as the rules of the House are now constituted it is impossible to introduce such a resolution except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan is well taken; that the gentleman from New York has not stated anything which up to this time amounts to a question of privilege. It is not to a question of personal privilege to which the gentleman rose.

Mr. HUTCHINS. Is this not a matter affecting the dignity of this House? I am anxious to vote on the bills referred to. If I am allowed to do so I will introduce a resolution calling upon the committee to report. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] is recognized to move that the morning hour be dispensed with, and he states his object to be to bring up the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I desire also to add the motion that when the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union all general debate on the pending bill be closed in one and a half hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better first move to dispense with the morning hour, and to do this a two-thirds vote of the House is required.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I will make the motion at the proper time.

The question being put on the motion to dispense with the morning hour, there were—ayes 73, noes 56.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the morning hour was not dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at nineteen minutes past twelve o'clock, the business of the morning hour being the call of committees for reports to be appropriately referred and printed.

CHARLES B. SHIRLEY.

Mr. HENRY, from the Committee on Accounts, reported back the petition of Charles B. Shirley for $2,063.88, for services rendered the House of Representatives, and allowed heretofore by the Committee on Accounts; and moved that the Committee on Accounts be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DUNNELL. This being a report of a private nature, is it in order under this call?

The SPEAKER. Reports of a private nature are in order on any day in the morning hour, but reports of a public nature are not in order on Friday.

The motion of Mr. HENRY was agreed to.

MILEAGE OF MARSHALS.

Mr. PHILIPS, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 426) to regulate the mileage of marshals, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WAGES ON HOLIDAYS IN GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 253) providing for payment of wages to employes in the Government Printing Office for legal holidays; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EXPENSES OF PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, also, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 447) to reduce the expenditures of the public printing, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi will please take notice there is no report accompanying this bill, as required under the rule. The rules require there should be a report in writing accompanying every bill reported.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. There is a report prepared and I will hand it in. I thought I had sent it with the bill.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report was ordered to be printed.

STATUE ON SUB-TREASURY BUILDING, NEW YORK.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on the Library, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 4917, granting permission to the Chamber of Commerce of New York to erect a statue on the sub-treasury building, in the city of New York, a bill (H. R. No. 5384) with the same title; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THE CENSUS.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, from the Joint Select Committee on the Census, reported back, with amendments, the bill (S. No. 885) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for taking the tenth and subsequent censuses," approved March 3, 1879, and moved that the bill be recommitted, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, printed.

The SPEAKER. With reference to this census bill the Chair thinks the House after the morning hour had better fix some time for its consideration.

Mr. CONGER. Let the report be withdrawn for the present.

The SPEAKER. Does not the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] desire the immediate action of the House on this bill?

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. Yes, sir. The only trouble about it is there is a gentleman on the floor who objects and I cannot get the bill before the House except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. When reported during the morning hour it goes on the Calendar.

Mr. DUNNELL. The bill will certainly provoke debate.

The SPEAKER. All that the gentleman from Kentucky asks at present is to have the amendments printed and the bill and amendments recommitted.

Mr. CONGER. That might be done.

The motion of Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, was agreed to.

RIGHTS OF WOMEN CITIZENS.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Rules to report a resolution providing for the appointment of a special committee on the political rights of women citizens, and to move that it be placed on the House Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. Let it be read.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives. That the Speaker appoint a special committee of nine members, to whom shall be referred all memorials, petitions, bills, and resolutions relating to the rights of women citizens of the United States, with power to hear the same and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The resolution was referred to the House Calendar.

CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. O'CONNOR, from the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1513, a bill (H. R. No. 5385) providing for the judicial ascertainment of claims against the United States; which was read a first and second time, with the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would inquire if there is anything in that bill which would render it subject to a point of order on account of containing an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. If there is, it would be subject to the point of order when taken up for consideration.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT AND VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. BICKNELL, from the Select Committee on the state of the law respecting ascertainment and declaration of result of election of President and Vice-President, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 223) amending the Constitution as to the election of President and Vice-President; and the same was placed on the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ALCOHOLIC LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. BREWER, from the Select Committee on the Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2387, a bill (H. R. No. 5386) providing for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was read a first and second time, with the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BOUCK. I desire to submit the views of the minority and ask to have them printed with the majority report.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CINCINNATI CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would inquire if the Select Committee to Investigate the Late Congressional Election in Cincinnati has reported? The SPEAKER. It was called, but no report was submitted.

Mr. GARFIELD. It has been a long time since the committee was appointed.

Mr. CARLISLE. If I may be allowed to do so I will state that the manuscript of the testimony was sent to the Public Printing Office to be printed for the use of the committee, and the printing was almost completed when the difficulty occurred in regard to the appropriation for the public printing.

Mr. FRYE. I would inquire of the gentleman if there is any necessity for making any report at all?

Mr. CARLISLE. I think there is.

RELIGIOUS BOOKS IN THE CHINESE LANGUAGE.

Mr. TUCKER. I am instructed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4424) to admit free of duty Bibles and other religious books in the Chinese language for gratuitous distribution by religious and missionary societies. It is the unanimous report of the committee, and if there be no objection I would like to have it considered now.

Mr. GARFIELD. Under the rule it cannot now be considered.

The SPEAKER. The rule requires that all reports from committees during the morning hour shall be referred to their appropriate calendars.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM S. KIMBALL & CO.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5387) to refund certain taxes illegally assessed against and collected from William S. Kimball & Co. and others; which was read a first and second time, with the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

WILLIAM J. POLLOCK.

Mr. KELLEY also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1534) for the relief of William J. Pollock, late collector of internal revenue of the second district of Pennsylvania; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM D. MARTIN.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5388) for the relief of William D. Martin, of Bedford County, Virginia, and for refunding to him certain taxes upon brandy swept away and destroyed by a flood; which was read a first and second time, with the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

SAMUEL HARPER.

Mr. CONGER, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 4187, a bill (H. R. No. 5389) for the relief of Samuel Harper; which was read a first and second time, with the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

DUTY ON BARLEY MALT.

Mr. MORRISON, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4585) fixing the rate of duty on barley malt at twenty-five cents per bushel; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

IMMEDIATE TRANSPORTATION OF DUTIABLE GOODS.

Mr. MORRISON also, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 4911) to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

IRON MOUNTAIN BANK, MISSOURI.

Mr. MORRISON also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3155) for the relief of the Iron Mountain Bank, of Saint Louis, Missouri; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MRS. MARGARETTA BENDER.

Mr. MORRISON also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 3902) to refund to Mrs. Margaretta Bender certain money paid by her into the United States Treasury to compromise a violation of the revenue law by her insane husband; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. THOMPSON.

Mr. CARLISLE, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 346) for the relief of William H. Thompson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER SMILEY.

Mr. MILLS, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5390) for the relief of Alexander Smiley; which was read a first and second time, with the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

WILLIAM R. WILMER.

Mr. PHELPS, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 301) for the relief of William R. Wilmer; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

W. J. TAPP & CO.

Mr. PHELPS, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4622) for the relief of W. J. Tapp & Co.; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. POWELL.

Mr. PHELPS, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5391) for the relief of William H. Powell; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF TOBACCO IN PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report back without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 196) authorizing the removal of tobacco in process of manufacture, and to ask its reference to the Public Calendar.

Mr. GARFIELD. I raise the question whether this bill should not go to the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will state my reason for making this point. I think it important to us to have a ruling now. I understand that the bill makes no appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that it does not make an appropriation.

Mr. GARFIELD. But that, as I understand, is no reason why it should go to the Public Calendar, if the bill is itself of a private nature. Being private, whether it contains an appropriation or not, it should go to the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman reporting this bill whether it does not change a public law in relation to the manner of collecting the revenue.

Mr. DUNNELL. It does.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understood from the gentleman that the bill was for the relief of some particular persons.

The SPEAKER. As the point of order is made, the bill might as well be read. Gentlemen will see that the inquiry just put by the Chair bears directly upon the question where the bill should go.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Jacob Charles Appleby and George W. Helme, composing the commercial firm of Appleby & Helme, of New York, be, and are hereby, authorized to remove, in bulk, packages, from their factory at or near Spotswood, in the third district of New Jersey, cut tobacco and snuff, in process of preparation for sale, to their factory in the second district of New York, to be there packed into the form of packages and stamped as is prescribed by law: Provided, That such removal shall be made under permit and supervision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as is provided for the removal of snuff and tobacco in process of manufacture.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Rule XXIII, clause 3, provides that—

All motions or propositions involving a tax or charge upon the people, all proceedings touching appropriations of money, * * * shall be first considered in a Committee of the Whole.

And Rule XIII, section 1, clause 1, provides that—

First. A Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which shall be referred bills raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills of a public character, directly or indirectly appropriating money or property.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no doubt that the bill should go to the Committee of the Whole. The only question I raise is as to which of the Calendars it should go to, because there are two Committees of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is a bill relating to the revenue laws. The provision of the rule read a moment ago would seem to require that such bills should go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GARFIELD. This bill in no way affects the revenue.

The SPEAKER. It changes the revenue laws.

Mr. GARFIELD. No; it simply grants to particular parties certain privileges.

The SPEAKER. It is a change of general law because the general law makes no such exception.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is entirely a friendly controversy—

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. GARFIELD. A friendly controversy for the purpose of settling the practice under the rule; and I think the question is important. The Chair is undoubtedly right in holding that as the bill relates to the application of the revenue laws it must go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. If it did not change the existing law on this subject it would be unnecessary to introduce such a bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. But it only changes the existing law as to two persons, constituting a firm; it grants to them certain privileges, and puts them under certain restrictions. This bill, if passed, will not be a law to anybody in the world but this firm. It is rather a bill of privileges to this firm, making, it is true, an exception as to them in reference to the law. But the whole question is as to the fitness of this firm for having this privilege. The bill therefore becomes, I think, a private one, and should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar for the reason that it is essentially a private bill, affecting only a single business firm.

The SPEAKER. Does it not change a public law relating to the collection of the revenues of the Government? The Chair thinks it does. The rules seem to require that all such business ought to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The rules go further, and give absolute preference to a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of such business at any time after the morning hour.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the Chair will allow me a word further before ruling finally—

The SPEAKER. The Chair will listen before he decides.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say that I reported a few minutes ago a bill to pay out of the Treasury $42 to a distiller in Virginia who had complied exactly with the internal-revenue law and the regulations of the Department in reference to his brandy or whisky, which had been swept away by flood. The bill provided that the tax to this extent should be refunded. We thereby change the existing internal-revenue law—

The SPEAKER. Does the existing internal-revenue law provide for such exemption?

Mr. GARFIELD. It becomes necessary to change the law as to this man; but the bill is private; and I had it referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Now, here is a bill which changes the provisions of the laws in relation to one firm—grants them privileges. I think that is as much a private bill as the one I introduced.

The SPEAKER. It changes public law.

Mr. TUCKER. Let me say in relation to the remark the gentleman made just now, there is no provision of the internal-revenue law by which the Executive Department could remit or refund that sum; and that is the reason this firm comes to Congress for relief.

The SPEAKER. There is a provision of the internal-revenue laws which allows the refunding of taxes improperly collected.

Mr. TUCKER. Yes; in certain cases; but not in such a case as this. It is, therefore, a private claim under the general revenue laws.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no wish about this matter further than that the proper course should be pursued.

Mr. CONGER. I think, Mr. Speaker, this point will settle the case. Suppose this goes to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar and a motion is made to extend that provision to all other manufacturers of a like character; which might be very well done.

The SPEAKER. Such amendment being germane.

Mr. CONGER. Then to extend the provision to all other manufacturers of that kind; and that would make it a general law by one single amendment.

The SPEAKER. It might be amended by striking out the name and making it general in its character. Then it would be too late to raise the point that it was a public and not a private bill.

Mr. FRYE. I agree entirely with the Speaker; and will illustrate it by this point. Suppose there was a general law which said a certain rate of tax should be imposed on the tobacco raised in this country, and the Committee on Ways and Means reported an amendment to it excepting that raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin. Clearly that would be a general bill, and should go to the Public Calendar.

The SPEAKER. This changes public law.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have no choice myself; but there is one point I desire to suggest. My idea is this does not at all affect or change the revenue laws. The bill simply affects the status of an individual firm under the general law.

The SPEAKER. And does it not change existing public law in favor of this party?

Mr. DUNNELL. I think not.

The SPEAKER. Why, then, introduce it?

Mr. GARFIELD. It confers a privilege on one firm.

The SPEAKER. The terms privilege and exception as used in debate here seem to be synonymous.

So the bill and accompanying report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. HENRY RIVES.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5392) for the relief of J. Henry Rives, collector for the fifth Virginia district; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROBERT STODART WYLD.

Mr. FRYE also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R.

No. 5393) for the relief of Robert Stodart Wyld; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. GEDDES. I rise to make an inquiry. Under the call, I notice the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions was not called. I desire to inquire whether it would be in order to call for that committee now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it should be called. It was not called because it was not on the printed list. The committee has but recently been provided for.

Mr. GEDDES. I ask, then, to have it called.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] to report.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Select Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, reported back, as a substitute for House bill No. 4652, a bill (H. R. No. 5394) to organize a court of pensions; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. Does this bill involve the appropriation of any money, or is it in any way a tax upon the people?

Mr. GEDDES. I presume it is, sir.

The SPEAKER. Then it will have to go to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GEDDES. I have no objection to that reference.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the views of the minority, accompanied by a substitute, in order that they may accompany the report of the majority of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The views of the minority will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRYE. But there is a substitute accompanying that minority report.

The SPEAKER. The views of the minority, together with the substitute they recommend, will accompany the majority report and be printed, so that when the subject comes up for consideration the substitute will be in shape to be moved to the original proposition.

COAST SURVEY.

Mr. ATKINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey for the year ending June 30, 1879, and move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Commerce never has had any control of that subject. Heretofore the Committee on Appropriations have had charge of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas move to amend the reference?

Mr. REAGAN. Yes, sir, if necessary.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the Committee on the Public Lands might be the proper one to which this should go.

Mr. REAGAN. I will move to amend the reference if necessary.

The SPEAKER. It is necessary, because the gentleman from Tennessee reports this from the Committee on Appropriations for reference to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ATKINS. I think that the gentleman from Texas had better let this go to the Committee on Commerce. That is a very painstaking committee, and the matter will have full and proper consideration before that committee.

Mr. REAGAN. That is a subject which has never yet been before the Committee on Commerce, and that committee would have no power in reporting it back to make any appropriations for continuing the service. Appropriations for that purpose have been made by the Committee on Appropriations in a regular bill, and the Committee on Commerce will have no power over it except to report it, and then let the Committee on Appropriations take charge of it, or to report it back and let it go to the Calendar in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Coast Survey matters have generally been before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REAGAN. There is no other committee which can so efficiently deal with the subject, and I think it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BLOUNT. The whole question of the Coast and Geodetic Survey rests entirely upon appropriations. There has been no legislation in reference to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no general law on this subject.

Mr. BLOUNT. It seems to me it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REAGAN. I think if it is desirable to continue that survey, then it should go to the Committee on Appropriations. I know of no way better than to allow it to remain with that committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask for the reading of the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, December 12, 1879.

SIR: In compliance with section 4690 United States Revised Statutes, I have the honor to transmit herewith for the information of the House of Representatives a report addressed to this Department by Carlisle P. Patterson, Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, showing the progress made in the survey of the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts during the year ended June 30, 1879, and accompanied with a map illustrating the general progress made in that work.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. REAGAN. I am constrained to believe that the gentleman from Tennessee had better allow that to go to his own committee. It can be dealt with by no other committee. It cannot be efficiently dealt with by the Committee on Commerce, and even if reported by that committee there will be no way of getting it before the House except by unanimous consent. I understand it is a work of great importance, and there is no committee that can get that subject before the House except the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. The Superintendent of the Coast Survey desired the reference of this matter to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. REAGAN. It may be that he has some views which he desires the Committee on Commerce to examine. The difficulty is this: The work is one which, if it is deemed important to prosecute, the appropriations to that end must be annually made. If made at all they can only be made by the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. They are usually made in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think, if my colleague will permit me—

Mr. ATKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think that heretofore that whole service has been based on appropriations, and that the officer in charge of it desires legislation in order to give permanency to it, and that is probably his reason for desiring it to be sent to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. REAGAN. But the money to carry it on must come through the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ATKINS. The Superintendent did not give me his reasons, but the report ought to be printed any way.

The SPEAKER. It is a very important report.

Mr. ATKINS. And whatever committee it goes to should have it printed.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think it had better be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations. It contains information which the committee needs in making appropriations for another year.

Mr. ATKINS. It should either go to the Committee on Commerce or the Committee on Appropriations, one or the other, I am indifferent which. But let it be printed.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I move that it be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY QUARTERS, FORT LEAVENWORTH.

Mr. ATKINS also, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back that committee a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting estimates for company quarters at Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, with the recommendation that said committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

WRITS OF ERROR IN TERRITORIAL COURTS.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (S. No. 905) in relation to writs of error to the supreme courts of the Territories in capital cases; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to ask how the Committee on the Judiciary is reached at this time in the call?

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman that under the old rules the last call of committees had proceeded until about the middle of the list was reached, and under the new rules the Chair continued the call from that point to the end of the list of committees as placed under old rules, after which the call will proceed in accordance with the new rule.

COMPENSATION OF OFFICERS OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. KNOTT. I am also directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the House resolution to appoint a committee to investigate the present system of compensation of clerks and other officers of the United States courts, with a substitute therefor, and to move that the resolution and substitute be referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. That resolution, as I understand, makes an appropriation of money. It should go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. KNOTT. The resolution does not require an appropriation. It provides that the expenses shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House already appropriated.

The SPEAKER. If the resolution takes money out of the contingent fund it should go to the Committee of the Whole. The Chair recently so decided when this point was made and insisted upon.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let the resolution be read.

The resolution was read.

Mr. GARFIELD. That goes to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. It goes to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

UNITED STATES SUPERVISORS OF ELECTIONS, ETC.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 2142) to regulate the number and pay of United States supervisors of elections and special deputy marshals appointed under sections 2012 and 2021 of the Revised Statutes, and moved that the bill and amendments, with the accompanying report, be referred to the House Calendar, and printed.

Mr. CONGER. That bill makes an appropriation, as I understand.

Mr. KNOTT. The bill makes no appropriation at all.

The bill and amendments, with the accompanying report, were referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask that the minority of the committee may have the privilege of filing a report to accompany the report of the majority.

The SPEAKER. The minority will have that privilege, if there be no objection.

PRACTICE IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4140) regulating the practice in United States circuit and district courts as to the time and manner of instructing juries and arguing the cause; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ROGER A. PRYOR.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5395) to remove the political disabilities of Roger A. Pryor, of New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

THOMAS L. HARRISON.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5396) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Harrison, of Mobile, Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS H. SMITH, SR.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5397) to remove the political disabilities of Francis H. Smith, sr., of Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

S. BANA.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5398) to remove the political disabilities of S. Bana, of Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILBURN B. HALL.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 4486) to remove the political disabilities of Wilburn B. Hall, of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM B. ISAACS & CO.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 254) in re claim of William B. Isaacs & Co.; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. This joint resolution refers this claim to the Court of Claims for adjudication. The Speaker will decide to which Calendar it should go, whether the House Calendar, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, or the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. What is the wish of the committee?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The committee express no wish. The bill makes no appropriation of money.

Mr. BREWER. The joint resolution it seems to me should go to the Private Calendar. It appears to be for the relief of individuals.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is a private bill and that it should go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask also that the report of the last Congress in this case, with the accompanying documents, be printed as the report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that this case was on the Private Calendar in the last Congress.

Mr. BUCKNER. Where there is no appropriation, does the Chair rule that the joint resolution goes to the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER. This takes money out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BUCKNER. As I understand it takes no money out of the Treasury. Like the bills reported a few moments ago from the Committee on the Judiciary, relieving individuals of disabilities, I think this belongs to the House Calendar rather than to the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The House Calendar is for public bills only.

Mr. BUCKNER. For public bills only? I thought the Private Calendar was for private bills that required an appropriation.

The SPEAKER. There are but few private bills that do not require an appropriation. However, all private bills go to the Private Calendar. The Chair will cause Rule XIII to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

There shall be three calendars of business reported from committees, namely:

First. A Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, to which shall be referred bills raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills of a public character, directly or indirectly appropriating money or property;

Second. A House Calendar, to which shall be referred all bills of a public character not raising revenue nor directly or indirectly appropriating money or property; and Third. A Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House, to which shall be referred all bills of a private character.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I think the joint resolution should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The joint resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES GREEN.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 5399) for the relief of James Green, of Alexandria, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, with the accompanying report ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

TRADE WITH INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. HOUSE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. No. 324) to declare the legal effect of permits granted by the President of the United States to purchase products of the insurrectionary States.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be laid upon the table, and the accompanying report will be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does not the rule require that this bill shall go to a calendar?

The SPEAKER. If any member demands it, it will be placed on a calendar. The practice has been, where a committee reports a bill adversely, to lay it upon the table immediately; but it is competent for any member to claim the right to have the bill placed upon a calendar so that it may be considered by the whole House.

Mr. GARFIELD. What I wanted to say is, that if any member wants to save this bill the only way he could do so would be to demand that it be placed upon a calendar.

The SPEAKER. The committee in effect moves, as it were, that the bill be laid upon the table. It is competent, however, for any member of the House to claim as his individual right that the bill be placed upon a calendar in order that it may be considered by the whole House, with the disadvantage only of the opinion of the committee that it should be defeated.

Mr. GARFIELD. And the silence of the House in this case is construed into agreeing to the adverse report of the committee?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no doubt that is all right.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would inquire of the Chair whether, if the House shall lay this bill upon the table to-day, any member will have the right hereafter to ask that it be placed on a calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say not, except by motion to reconsider, and thus bring it before the House again.

The bill was accordingly laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

W. H. BROWN.

Mr. HOUSE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the petition of W. H. Brown, of Alabama, praying that interest improperly paid by him be refunded; and to move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration and that the same be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I call for the regular order.

MINING DÉBRIS, SACRAMENTO RIVER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires unanimous consent that the letter from the Secretary of War relative to the effects of mining débris in the Sacramento River, which was referred on yesterday to the Committee on Mines and Mining, be printed for the use of said committee.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask permission to introduce a joint resolution for action at this time. I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I must call for the regular order. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. Pending that motion I move that all general debate upon the bill be closed at three o'clock to-day.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONGER. I ask consent that Senate bill No. 142 be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] has already declined to yield to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON.]

Mr. CONGER. Very well; I will not ask it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I will yield to the gentleman from Virginia if it gives rise to no debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be fair to permit one gentleman on each side to ask consent for a proposition.

ROBERT L. MARTIN.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 255) for the relief of Robert L. Martin; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution grants leave to Robert L. Martin to withdraw from the files of the House the papers and proofs filed by him before the southern claims commission in support of his disallowed claims.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. MCCLINTOCK.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill No. 142 be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

There was no objection; and accordingly the bill (S. No. 142) for the relief of John M. McClintock was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows: To Mr. O'CONNOR, for one week from and after Monday next;

To Mr. ORTH, for ten days from Tuesday next, on account of important business; and

To Mr. COWGILL, for ten days from Tuesday next, on account of important business.

NELSON LYON AND JEREMIAH S. JAMES.

Mr. VANCE. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 2518) for the relief of Nelson Lyon and Jeremiah S. James. This bill has passed both Houses, but the Senate has made an amendment, to which we make no objection, and in which we desire concurrence.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and the amendment of the Senate read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall operate to invalidate the rights of any persons to whom assignments may have been made or licenses granted under said letters; but such assignments and licenses shall be as valid under said corrected letters-patent as they would have been had said letters-patent as originally granted been operative and valid.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. VANCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES KING.

On motion of Mr. CLAFLIN, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 1044) granting a pension to James King, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I call for the regular order.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. CONVERSE in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3035) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. On this bill the House has ordered that general debate terminate at three o'clock this afternoon. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. Chairman, unless the bill now under consideration shall be very materially modified and changed in many of its features, I shall not give it my support. I am very well aware of the fact that it is an unpalatable task for a member of any committee of this House, especially of the Committee on Appropriations, to offer opposition and interpose objections to any measure reported from the committee to the House with a recommendation for passage. My objections to this bill will appear by the amendments that I shall offer as we proceed with the consideration of the bill under the operation of the five-minute rule. In my judgment this is a crude bill. I do not mean to reflect upon those gentlemen who, as the sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations, have had the bill in charge, have put it in shape, and offered it to the House for acceptance. But I think this bill was very fairly described by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] having it in charge, the chairman of the sub-committee that prepared it. In the very opening sentences of his speech that gentleman denominated it a "copy of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill last year." The consular and diplomatic appropriation bill of last year was a copy of the corresponding bill of the year before, and we have the high authority of the gentleman holding this measure in charge for the statement that this is a copy of the bill which made appropriations for the present fiscal year.

I think it will be found as we progress with the consideration of the bill that there are changes which should be made, that there are amendments which should be ingrafted upon the bill, that there are defects in our diplomatic and consular system which address themselves to this House for remedy and correction. Proceeding to call the attention of the House seriatim to the objections which may be urged, I will first undertake to correct the statement inadvertently fallen into, I am sure, by the gentleman having the bill in charge, to the effect that your consular system is self-supporting. I find in the speech of the gentleman, as reported in the RECORD of the 23d instant, this statement:

Upon an examination of the figures in the Fifth Auditor's report for 1879 it will be found that the system paid all its expenses for that year and in addition turned over to the United States Treasury $131,390.92.

It will be seen that the gentleman refers to the report of the Fifth Auditor as applicable to the consular system. Mr. Chairman, if you will take the receipts of the United States Treasury for consular fees for the year ending June 30, 1879, as reported by the Register of the Treasury, you will find the amount $449,610.48. From passport fees the amount received was $21,380. But passport fees are not to be credited to your consular system; they belong rather to the legations, and are properly to be credited to your diplomatic service. But giving the consular system the benefit of this credit, you received from these sources, according to the report of the Register of the Treasury which lies before me, for the year ending June 30, 1879, the sum of $470,990.49. I grant that the Fifth Auditor's report shows $682,901.18; but the report of the Register of the Treasury exhibits the precise amount of money received from these sources by the Federal Treasury. I find that the consular expenses for the year were $462,870.02; consular contingencies, $119,681.51; miscellaneous, (contingent expenses,) $29,358.23.

So, sir, you find instead of it being a self-sustaining system it falls short, according to the official data which are furnished you by the Register of the Treasury, to an amount between one and two hundred thousand dollars. If this serves to show anything it goes to prove that your consular system itself, as a system, is defective.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not mean to be regarded as one who would strike down or impair that consular service. The criticisms which I am disposed to pass upon this bill do not reach to that system except as to its defects. I believe the consular system of this country is well calculated to extend its commerce, to build up its trade, to bring us into closer contact with foreign powers, and to furnish us with those markets abroad which we so sadly need for the productions which we ourselves have to send to consumers. My criticisms are upon the defects of that consular system, as I will proceed to show.

This is a bill with two purposes. It provides for the maintenance of the diplomatic as well as the consular service. Against the diplomatic feature of the bill I do not stand opposed. I do not believe that it is the part of wisdom, that statesmanship would suggest or fair dealing would prompt the employment of that description of demagoguery which would cripple the diplomatic service by a reduction of its salaries or a curtailment of its pay. If this Government is to be represented in foreign courts by ministers plenipotentiary and envoys extraordinary I trust I will be the last man who will seek to abridge or curtail the compensation they are now receiving.

My objection goes further; it goes deeper. I do not believe, sir, that this Government has any interest that is to be protected or promoted by the maintenance of the diplomatic system for which it now expends nearly half a million of money annually at foreign courts in Europe. I rather agree with the opinions expressed by men whose experience was far greater than my own, whose opportunities for observation, whose chances to measure correctly the results as compared with the cost far exceed any that I may boast. I agree most fully, sir, with the sentiments expressed by a distinguished Senator from the State of Ohio [Mr. Wade] as far back as 1867, when he declared in the Senate Chamber:

Here let me say, if I could have my own way about it, I never would have a resident minister abroad. I would abolish the whole of them. I do not think they are of any kind of importance to us. I do not think they do any good in our relations with Europe. There may be barbarous nations with which we have communications where a resident minister all the time may be of some service; but with those nations of Europe with whom we are in constant communication, having treaties well understood with each other, there is no more need for, and no more importance to be attached to, a resident minister than there is to have such agents sent by these States to each other.

I do not believe, sir, that it is within the power of any member of this House to point to a single instance within the last decade where the interests of the American people have either been promoted or protected by the presence of a foreign minister at any foreign court. I refer now to the speech made by my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations from Ohio, [Mr. MONROE.] It was a fair, eminently fair, scholarly, admirable presentation of the side of the case which he had espoused, dealing with the issues involved with that fairness for which he is so justly proverbial, but still the victim of a bias probably coming down to him and clinging to him from the days of his own worthy service in the interest of his country abroad. He sought to refer us to an instance wherein material advantages had resulted to the country when what were known as the Alabama claims were under discussion and the sharp issue presented between the government of Great Britain and our own in reference to the former's responsibility and liability under the neutrality laws. I find that in that effort he quotes with approval the distinguished services rendered by the then resident minister of the United States accredited to the English court, and in order to be exactly accurate I read from the gentleman's own speech. He tells us:

It was a moment when the right word heartily spoken saves nations from years of calamity. Early in June General Schenck delivered to Mr. Adams, then on his way to Geneva, a memorandum in regard to the "indirect claims," which was made the basis for the settlement of that trouble—some question in the tribunal. On the 15th of June, 1873, the tribunal reassembled at Geneva, and on the 27th of that month all serious difficulties between the two countries were removed by the decision of the tribunal that the "indirect claims" should be wholly excluded from its consideration.

Why, sir, the gentleman from Ohio, just preceding this sentence, had told us of the brusque manner in which the American minister had broken in upon the English authorities in council to enter a protest to save us from probable complications with that government which might result in war, claiming credit for the service thus rendered by the American minister. With that fairness which always characterizes his utterance, he admits himself the difficulty was avoided, the trouble was adjusted, understanding was secured only when the very point, and the only point in issue upon which the foreign minister resident at the court of Saint James had been wasting all his energy and concentrating all his powers, was decided against us absolutely and in toto. The only serious cause of grievance or difficulty ever found pending before that Geneva tribunal was the single question as to whether the American Government's claim for indirect damages should be allowed. It was that, and that alone, to which that foreign minister had directed his attention. A decision was reached. It was adverse to us so far as results and consequences are concerned according to the candid admission of the gentleman from Ohio, and we stood precisely where we would have stood if we had never been furnished with a minister at that court. Why, sir, who is there around me here who does not know that this Government to-day has but four first-class foreign ministers, namely, to Great Britain, to France, to Germany, and to Russia, and is there a gentleman here on this floor who does not know that two of these missions have been vacant, one by resignation and the other by absence for about one-half of the present year? Who is there around me who will undertake to say, where is the man who is bold enough and reckless enough to declare that this Government has suffered one whit by reason of these vacancies? No, sir; those offices have moved on just as smoothly, your relations have been preserved as pleasantly, and your affairs conducted just as satisfactorily as though no one had ever been accredited to either of these missions.

Why, sir, with the aid of the marine telegraph bringing these foreign capitalists into momentary intercourse and contact with your State Department, you have no earthly need, no imaginable use for the minister resident at any continental power to be found in Europe. But even if you had, even if exigencies might arise, if circumstances did or should exist, I beg you to cast your eye back over the foreign records of your history for the last decade, and tell me whether you have derived any advantage thereby? Does trouble occur with the Spanish power—if so, the minister resident is ignored, and Cushing, of Massachusetts, sent as a special envoy to accommodate your differences. Are you likely to be involved in war with Great Britain over the asserted and unadjusted claims which grew into such large and measureless proportions as the consequences and results of your late civil war? If so, it is not your minister resident but a tribunal of arbitrators to be convened at Geneva which must take these matters into hand. Do you find yourself to-day, sir, threatened with international complications with the Chinese Empire? Answering yes, I ask you what have you done, what disposition have you made of your resident minister Seward? Have you intrusted to his keeping the issues which are involved? On yesterday or on the day before nominations were made by the President to the Senate in the other wing of this building to appoint a commission of three men to go there and adjust these issues and compromise these troubles. No, sir; I defy the advocates of the diplomatic service to name one instance.

A MEMBER. And Mexico.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And Mexico might be cited as another example, for it does but prove the rule to which I challenge any gentleman on this floor to offer a single exception. But, Mr. Chairman, if in all of this I shall be in error, if the best interests of this country do demand the maintenance of the diplomatic service and if it is absolutely essential that service shall be maintained and supported, denying any purpose to cripple it by a reduction of appropriations, I do most emphatically insist that this bill should provide some effective limitation upon the abuses that exist in the service and in our practice under the sanction of existing laws. I cannot for the life of me see the equity of allowing a foreign minister of this Government to draw his fixed and separate salary and then, by way of perquisites, or as our Army friends would term it "commutation," be allowed also a salary in transitu, an instruction salary.

There is not a foreign minister accredited from this Government to any power that does not draw his instruction salary, and that instruction salary amounts to payment for thirty days while he is being coached or presumed to be coached at the Department of State in the matter of the obligation and the duties to be devolved upon him. I cannot see the necessity for this, and I do not believe that any American minister ever sailed or steamed out of one of our ports bearing his credentials to a foreign power who ever carried to it more information as to the routine of duties devolving upon him there than he might have learned in thirty minutes time from the sheerest novice to be found in the limits of your capital. But, sir, this is not the main abuse which may be practiced under the existing law. The law allows that each minister may be absent from his post of duty for a period not exceeding sixty days in any one year. And it matters not whether you count by the calendar or the fiscal year. You would have simply to change the dates in order to make visible the abuse to which I refer.

I say, under existing laws, allowing each minister to be absent sixty days from his post each year, allowing him in addition to that time such number of days as may be necessary for him to reach home from the court to which he is accredited, and then piling up the additional number of days which may be necessary for his return from his home to the scene of his duties—I say that you can have every minister of your Government absent eight months every year, whether it be a fiscal or a calendar year. You have thirty days to come home and thirty days to go back. You have sixty days to stay. You may use those last four months in the conclusion of the current fiscal year or calendar year and take the first four months in the succeeding year; and a continuous absence of eight months out of twelve is perfectly competent and attainable under the law as you have it now, with no abatement of salary, but a promotion by way of increase of salary; the minister receiving full pay all the time, and the subordinate officer, whether he be a chargé d'affaires or whether he be a secretary of legation, receiving increased pay in his absence.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will my colleague on the committee permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman if it has ever actually happened that any minister has taken leave of absence for eight months out of the twelve?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer my colleague, and say that if public reports are to be credited, which passed for months and months unchallenged, you have a foreign minister at the court of one of the first-class powers of Europe who has been absent at least more than half that time from his post of duty during the current year—more than half of eight months. And during the summer of 1873 there was nobody at the court of St. Petersburg.

I do not complain of this; for if I was to complain and say that damage had resulted or loss accrued I would destroy my own final objection to this feature of the bill, in which I declare that an absence of eight months, or an absence of twelve months in every year, in my humble judgment would not militate against the interests of this country at all if applied to all these ministers. But, sir, however that may be, if this House is determined to keep up that diplomatic service and maintain that diplomatic system, it does seem to me that there should be some limitation put, which the law has not as yet imposed, upon the matter of absenteeism from the post of duty by at least withholding pay during such protracted absence, in order to protect the service itself, as well as the Treasury of the Government, from a double payment for service that in both instances is but supposititious.

But it is not as to the diplomatic feature but rather as to the consular feature of this bill that I desire to address the House. It is that which in my judgment is the important question. I do not believe, I cannot bring myself to believe, that this bill has been as carefully considered and as thoroughly digested as it should have been, if indeed we want to promote the interests of the country that are wrapped up in and held by the consular representatives abroad.

I hold in my hand a memorandum I have made touching the rates of pay and compensation that seem to me to involve discrepancy. I have exhausted all reasonable, all legitimate, methods of inquiry. I have sought information from the members of the sub-committee having this bill in charge, and, failing them, I called from the Department of State before the bar of the Committee on Appropriations one of its own accredited officers, to ask him to tell me why it was that the very highest graded consular agents of this Government abroad, receiving the highest rates of salary, appeared by the report of the Register of the Treasury to have been assigned to duty to those posts where the very smallest quantum of fees was received, and, so far as returns to the departments of the country were concerned, the smallest imaginable amount of business was transacted.

I find here, sir, that at Bangkok we have a consul whose salary is $3,000 a year, whose contingent expenses are $956.85 a year; and I find that all the returns made from that port by way of fees or revenues—

Mr. HISCOCK. What place did the gentleman mention?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Bangkok, in Siam.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is the consul there not a judicial officer?

Mr. BLACKBURN. He has judicial functions, as have many. If the gentleman from New York desires, I will go into the record to show what judicial service this officer renders.

Mr. HISCOCK. The statute points that out.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If required, I will go into the record furnished me here to show the judicial services he renders. They amounted to less than the judicial services rendered by any magistrate or justice of the peace in any magisterial district in the United States.

Mr. HISCOCK. I do not desire to indicate the course the gentleman should pursue in his argument. I simply wish to have the House informed what duties this consul had to discharge.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am trying to tell the gentleman. He receives $3,000 a year, and his contingent expenses are $956.85. The fees received from that office, the gross revenues that we get from it, amount to the enormous sum of $420.97.

I find that at Beirut, in Turkey, we have a two-thousand-dollar salaried consul. The contingent expenses of that office are $478.60. The fees received from it for the last fiscal year amount to $107.70. And here in this very bill that lies before me is asked and provided another clerk, making the second one to the consul at that port—a second consular clerk for the consul at Beirut when he has one already.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. With the consent of the gentleman—

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman must have very contracted ideas of the duties and importance of these consulates, if he supposes that the amount of fees should govern the compensation of the consuls. There are many of them where the fees are very insignificant, but it is important we should have consuls in those countries where many of our people travel from time to time, and it is often necessary that they should receive assistance and protection. The amount of fees is not a fair standard by which to judge of the importance of a consulate.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I doubted not what would be the reply; I have grown used to that response. When I made this same inquiry of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] in charge of this bill in the committee-room, and asked him to furnish me with an explanation of these apparent discrepancies between outlay and return, his answer was that he did not know, that it was so stipulated in the bill of last year. And when the official of the State Department came before that committee, and I plied him with the same question, his answer was that it was provided in the bill of last year. I replied to him that it was also provided in the bill of year before last. And when I asked for a more explicit answer of the official of the Department, he replied that the consular fees under the consular system had not been regauged and remodeled.

Now, I find that the consul at Cairo in Egypt receives a salary of $4,000; he is allowed for contingent expenses $482.70, while the gross aggregate of fees is $298.75. Another clerk is wanted by that poorly paid and overworked foreign representative of this country. I find at Canton, China, that the salary of the consul is $3,500; contingent expenses, $913; gross aggregate of fees, $459. I find that the consul at Clifton, in Canada, is to receive $1,500 salary and $303 contingent expenses; while the gross receipts are $200. I find that the consul at Cork, Ireland, is provided with a salary of $2,000, with $364.66 for contingent expenses; while the gross revenue is $493.08. I find that for Goderich, in Canada, there is provided $2,000 for the salary of the consul and $343.56 for his contingent expenses, while the gross revenue is $380.50.

I find in the bill now pending before this committee a matter that I take it my friend from Mississippi will correct. I find that he provides a clerk for the last-named consulate when there is no consul at all provided for the place.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations if he would lay down as a rule that fees should be the basis of the salaries of consuls?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer my colleague on the committee by saying that until somebody can be found, some member of the sub-committee having this bill in charge, or until a search-warrant will develop a man in the Fifth Auditor's Office, the financial officer of the State Department, or in the Department itself—something we have up to this time been unable to discover—somebody who can give some other criterion or measure by which we are to gauge the business of a port, I accept this as the only one to be taken.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman says that we propose to provide a consular clerk for a port where there is no consul. Where is that?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will give it to you in a moment, [examining the bill.] I say that at Goderich, in Canada—

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Goderich?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes; at Goderich, in Canada, the gentleman provides for a consular clerk, but forgets to provide in his bill for a consul. I doubt not that the clerk would answer just as well.

In lines 48, 49, and 50 of this bill I find "for salaries of the second secretaries to the legations at Great Britain, France, and Germany, at $2,000 each, $6,000." Now the gentleman in charge of this bill may know (I do not, and after careful examination I have failed to discover) what duty, if any, these second secretaries of legation have to perform at these three courts. I do know that when a very prominent American statesman represented this Government in late years at the court of Paris he had his son acting as second secretary of legation, under the very provision and appropriation to which I now allude. And I know that that appointment had to be canceled because amid his multitudinous and multifarious duties that second secretary of legation, the son of Mr. Washburne, found time to engage as a promoter and joint proprietor of a circus company that was advertised at every street corner in the city of Paris.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. With the consent of the gentleman, I want him to point out where in this bill we have provided a clerk for a consul without the consul.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman will hold still I am coming to it.

Mr. ROBESON. Before the gentleman leaves the subject I want him to give me five minutes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I hope the gentleman does not want it out of my time.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I ask the gentleman to give me that information now.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will give it to you.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I have no doubt your corrections of this bill will be like many other corrections you have endeavored to make.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman is at all sensitive about corrections of that sort, I hope he will prove less so when I come to criticize his arithmetic. And in order to illustrate to this House exactly the crudities of which I complain, I will call attention to page 4 of the bill, where I find a mathematical inaccuracy. I find, beginning at line 81, the following:

For salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and thirteen consular clerks, $304,600, namely.

And he then proceeds to give the particulars. Now, if the gentleman will take his rules of addition and apply them to this portion of the bill, he will find that instead of $304,600 it amounts, under the law, taking the bill as he has arranged it and as he has copied it, to $303,500.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. That is really a "mare's-nest."

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes; and the gentleman will find another in a minute.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, rose.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I decline to be interrupted for a speech.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Just one word.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman can take his own time when I am done.

Now the gentleman may cover $1,000 of this mistake of $1,100 in plain simple addition by declaring that five of these consular clerks are receiving $1,200 instead of $1,000 a year. That I know to be true; and I am willing to believe that the gentleman knows it; but if he does he knows that it is not by warrant or authority of law but in absolute contempt and defiance of law.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. What is that statement?

Mr. BLACKBURN. That five of these consular clerks who are receiving $1,200 instead of $1,000 a year are receiving it in the face of the express provision of the statute here before me—are receiving it by no warrant or semblance of authority of law. The gentleman can only cover $1,000 of this arithmetical error of $1,100 by taking into his estimate this illegal payment given to these consular clerks.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Will the gentleman have the magnanimity to allow me to say one word?

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman will give me back my time.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman may speak all day, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I have not counted up these figures myself; the addition was done by a clerk, and it is possible that when you add up the whole amount appropriated for salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and clerks, there may be an error of $1,000, more or less, as the gentleman says. But it will be seen upon examination of the bill that every single salary is fixed, and whether the aggregate be more or less, it does not affect the interests of the Government at all, for none of these officers can draw more than the amount fixed for them respectively by law. That is all I wish to say.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I would have said all that for the gentleman. Now, if he will turn to page 10 of his own bill he will find at line 236 this provision:

For allowance for clerks at consulates, $55,500, as follows.

I grant that the bill does provide that amounts not exceeding certain sums shall be paid for salaries. I take it the House has a right to conclude when those rates of salary are given that they are those upon which we are passing. If this be true the gentleman has made another arithmetical error, and this time a larger one than the first. The bill provides, "for allowance for clerks at consulates, $55,500," and proceeds to name them. I have taken the trouble to tabulate these items; and I find at the rates of pay stated the amount required will be $58,500, instead of $55,500.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. That shows this only—

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not know what it does show.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The salaries are not to exceed a certain amount. We fix the amount $55,500 as the limitation beyond which the Secretary of State shall not go. He is bound to use no more than that sum for this purpose. There are no big salaries paid to any of these clerks, as the gentleman knows. We provide that the Department shall not expend beyond a certain sum, and we do not appropriate the extreme amount which the full payment of all the salaries might require. This is like all the other discoveries that the gentleman makes.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Well, I only regret, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman in charge of this bill has not made some discovery which would have enabled him to throw some light upon it when interrogated either by members of his own committee or by other members of the House.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I think my explanation is satisfactory to everybody else, though the gentleman may not be satisfied.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am content. I find, Mr. Chairman, a difference in the rates of pay allowed to interpreters at consulates. I find those rates ranging from $3,000 down to $750. Vainly did I inquire as to the necessity for this discrepancy. The nearest that I could come to any satisfactory solution of the allowance of $3,000 to the interpreter to the Turkish legation and $2,500 to the interpreter to the legation at Japan was predicated upon the religious bias of the gentleman having the bill in charge. It appeared that the additional amount was given in the way of donation to two gentlemen who are missionaries in those two countries.

Now, there is one abuse existing under this consular system which I am sure every member of this House will agree should be corrected. Under the law, wherever the salary of a consul does not exceed $1,500 and the fees of his office aggregate $3,000 per annum, he is entitled to such proportion of those fees as will raise the salary to $2,000 a year. The fees collected by a consul, subject only to this limitation which I have stated, must of necessity be accounted for and turned over to the Treasury of the United States; but the fees collected by consular agents belong to the agents under such limitations as the President of the United States may prescribe. The practical result (and no man will venture to question or deny it) is to turn over to the consular agent for division, which division the law itself contemplates and provides for, with the consul the fees which the agent shall collect. How many consuls do you imagine will busy themselves to sit up late of nights to collect fees which naturally flow into a consular office when they are simply to transfer them to the coffers of the Federal Treasury? But if they will turn them over to consular agents they are collected by the agents; the Federal Treasury never hears of it; they are pocketed by the agent and by the consul.

Now, sir, this is the practical working. It is the result. And those consular agents are appointed—how? They are appointed by the President on the recommendation of the consul. The consul makes out a list of agents he wants, seeing to it, I apprehend, he makes it sufficiently large to absorb every dollar of revenue which can be reached by a process direct or indirect and divert it from its course to the vaults of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do you know of any such abuse?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. Please point it out.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do it right here. I show it in this very quotation I have made. Take, sir, the report of the Register of the Treasury, and then take the report of the Fifth Auditor which I hold in my hand, and in the discrepancy in the revenue of the consular service of the country you will find exactly the answer to your question. The Fifth Auditor's report which the gentleman from Mississippi quoted on this floor the other day does show the revenues of the consular service of this country; but it took the report of the Register of the Treasury to show how much of those revenues passed into the pockets of the consular agent. That is the answer.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand the gentleman to say he knows of any instance in which the duties which could be discharged by consuls have been devolved on consular agents for the purpose of pocketing the fees in this way?

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HISCOCK. Give an instance.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I answer the gentleman in these very words, for neither he has the disposition nor I the time to engage in a quibble; I answer the gentleman and tell him that, unless that report of the Register of the Treasury be a forgery or that report of the Fifth Auditor be a fraud, there was received by consuls and consular agents during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, $548,665.05. There were turned in and reported to the Treasury of this Government but $470,990.49; and $21,380 of that ought to come off, because it came from passport fees which belong to your diplomatic and not to your consular service at all.

Mr. HISCOCK. May I inquire whether that might not all occur when consular agents were appointed to discharge duties where a consul could not discharge them, and therefore the fees received were received by the consular agent in full for doing the work?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not know what in the providence of God might not happen under a loose-jointed system like this diplomatic and consular one of ours.

Mr. HISCOCK. The point I wish to make, and if I take up too much of your time you shall have further time granted from our side—

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have no disposition to detain the House longer than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. HISCOCK. The point I make is this: these consular agents where they were appointed were appointed to discharge the duties which could not be discharged by the consul; and, as a matter of course, they received the fees in full satisfaction for the service they rendered; and there is, therefore, nothing in this report which shows those services have been devolved on them when they could have been discharged by the consuls themselves.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Before the gentleman proceeds further, I wish to settle that point on the clerkship to which he has referred.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am coming to that consulate directly.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Then do it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman is as impatient in reference to this debate as he was impatient to thrust this bill before this House. The sub-committee on appropriations were named on the 9th day of December. I know the gentleman's proverbial industry and energy, but it is hardly fair to presume he got to work before the 10th, and yet on the 14th of that month this bill, with all its deformities clinging to it, was thrust printed into the Committee on Appropriations for its approval.

Now, sir, I find here on page 11 a list beginning at the head of that page of probably twenty consular posts established, not one solitary one of which is to be found in the Revised Statutes of this country. The gentleman may answer and say the proposition was to strike out others and insert these. If he does, I hazard nothing in asserting to this House, neither he, nor I, nor any other member of the Committee on Appropriations, nor any other member of this House is possessed of one atom of information as to the motives which prompted the change or the advantages which are to accrue from it.

But more, I find that this bill provides for one hundred and sixty-three consuls. That is sixteen less in number than the Revised Statutes now allow, and I wish the gentleman who has been so lavish of his questions would now undertake to play the reverse rôle and answer some of mine. I find this bill provides for one hundred and sixty-three consuls, and the Revised Statutes provide for one hundred and seventy-nine, and yet I find that this bill appropriates $11,000 more money than the Revised Statutes provides for thirteen more consuls than this bill carries. Now, may be the gentleman is cognizant of that fact; and if he is, I trust that he will, when he comes to be heard, explain that discrepancy to us. There was a consulate at Goderich, in Canada, which was abolished and staid abolished—one of the defects in copying the consular and diplomatic bills prior to last year.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the consulate was retained?

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman will give me a chance I will try to say what I mean.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. But I ask the question, and I hope the gentleman will answer it.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer the gentleman if he will but take his seat and give me the chance, and I will tell him. I say that the consulate at Goderich, in Canada, was abolished. I say that the diplomatic and consular bill of 1878 reinstated it, and I say that this bill perpetuates it; at least for one year more continues it. And I do not believe that I hazard much in saying that no member of the sub-committee having this bill in charge will undertake to explain to this House what necessity there ever was for a consulate at Goderich, or for its re-establishment since the day of its abolition.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I understood you to say there was no consulate there.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I say that the consulate was abolished. And I say that it was reinstated without an assignment of any reason or necessity for it, or a single excuse why it should be done; and I say the gentleman from Mississippi stands here to-day without any more excuse for the re-establishing of that consulate, by an opinion even from the State Department as to its merits, than he has to offer for the twenty or more new consulates to be found on page 11 of his bill, which are outside of the Revised Statutes.

I find further that the gentleman appropriates in this bill the sum of $3,850, on page 13, "for rent of court-house and jail, with grounds appurtenant, at Yeddo, or such other place as shall be designated." I find that in line 293 of the same bill he has already appropriated "for rent of prison for American convicts in Japan, $750."

Does the gentleman want more than one prison established in Japan? Or was it a crudity into which he fell in making the two appropriations for the same purpose, and to be expended in the same way and in the same country?

I find further, on page 14, he appropriates the sum of $5,000 "to meet the necessary expenses attendant upon the execution of the neutrality act, to be expended under the direction of the President, pursuant to the requirement of section 291 of the Revised Statutes." Did not the gentleman know that the sum of $669.65 was all that was expended under that act and for that purpose during the last fiscal year?

In addition, he appropriates, in the very last clause of his bill, "for allowance to widows or heirs of deceased diplomatic and consular officers for the time that would be necessarily occupied in making the transit from the post of duty of the deceased to his residence in the United States, $5,000."

Did not the gentleman know that in the three years past but $1,666.89 has ever been expended in that direction? Gentlemen all know that just as in the case of the accredited foreign representative or consul-general to Mexico, and in the instance of Mr. Bayard Taylor, when minister at Berlin, these expenses are always met by a special act of Congress, and that they have no business in the general diplomatic bill. In three years' time the sum of $1,600 has been used for that purpose, and yet the gentleman inserts here, in one clause of his bill, for the next fiscal year, to meet this, the sum of $5,000.

And so, sir, you might go through the whole bill; and I cannot in all the examination that I have given to his bill find a single limitation imposed upon abuses that may be or have been practiced under the existing law, and this, too, by way of answer to my colleague on the committee from the State of New York. I do not charge that these abuses exist beyond the showing of the official reports illustrating a discrepancy between the Fifth Auditor's Office and the Register of the Treasury's office, but I did undertake to say, and I undertake to repeat it now, that there are abuses which are practicable under existing law, whether in the diplomatic or consular service.

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman will allow me to interrupt him at this point. As I understand the law, where there is no consulate a consular agency may be established.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Oh, no!

Mr. HISCOCK. That is the practical working of the law.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I speak of the law as it stands on the statute-book.

Mr. HISCOCK. But that is the practical working of the law. The officers may receive the fees which may be collected at those places in compensation for their services. Those fees have to be collected, and therefore arises this discrepancy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish to add that I have no factions fight against this bill, but I have a series of amendments which I desire to offer when we reach the clauses to which they are applicable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. As my colleague [Mr. BLACKBURN] represents the minority of the committee I think his time should be extended to permit him to give any information he may desire to lay before the committee.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman can publish his remarks. We have but half an hour remaining for general debate.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have never committed my remarks to writing in my life. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I do, unless the time allowed for debate is extended.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I am glad the objection comes from the quarter it does.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. If the time for general debate can be extended I have no objection to the gentleman proceeding, or, so far as I am concerned, he can proceed anyhow.

Mr. ROBESON. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will be permitted to complete his speech.

Mr. MONROE. At the end of my hour I was kindly allowed five minutes to complete a few sentences I desired to utter, and I hope the same indulgence will be extended to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Kentucky.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I wish to say in conclusion I would not have entered a protest against the passage of the bill in its present shape had it not been I would otherwise have gone upon the record as approving and indorsing from the stand-point of a member of the committee which has reported that bill a measure which in my deliberate judgment is faulty in many respects and fails to carry upon its face the salutary checks and limitations which should be enacted and ingrafted upon it, in order to prevent even the possibility of abuses that are to-day entirely attainable and practicable under the law.

I do not intend, sir, to dwell longer upon this. I am willing to confess, and I do confess, that there are numbers of clauses to be found in this bill, and multitudes of its provisions, the necessity and advisability or reason of which I am totally ignorant of. I simply desire in that connection to protest my want of blame or responsibility. I have not had the opportunity of advising myself which was given to the members of the sub-committee that drafted and prepared the bill. But they will bear me witness that I have failed to appropriate no opportunity to get information from them, from the State Department, the Fifth Auditor's Office, or wherever else one might reasonably expect to find it.

The consular system of this country needs to be revised; it needs to be enlarged; it needs to be encouraged. I am perfectly willing to take the amount appropriated in this bill in the aggregate, and expend it, every dollar, upon the perfection and the extension of that valuable commercial agency, the foreign consular representation of this Government. But, sir, the bill itself is some $48,000 in excess of the consular and diplomatic bill of the present fiscal year. I have pointed or have sought to point out to the House what appeared to me to be many of its crudities which should be scanned closely, and corrected and remedied, if such shall be the pleasure of the House.

In the five minutes' debate which shall occur, when amendments are in order, I will submit a series of amendments, not one of which, as I will challenge every member upon this floor to question, shall look to crippling but rather to the perfection and the extension of the consular system that we maintain, and none of them shall look either to the reduction of salary, the abridgment of compensation, or the abolition of your diplomatic system.

That should come from the Foreign Affairs Committee of this House. It is not the work of the Committee on Appropriations to undertake to abolish a thing that has existed for a century, a system that has come down to you through the ages, whose usefulness has been impaired, whose very essence, in my judgment, has been destroyed by reason of the progress and advancement that science has been making within the past half century.

But, sir, I do desire to protest that it is not American, neither is it republican, in its instincts or in its teaching to copy the pageantry and mimicry of royalty by seeking to foist into foreign courts the tinsel representatives of an effete practice, thereby serving only to play the rôle of the shoddy on limited allowance, in imitation of monarchical governments that rest for their maintenance not upon popular approval nor individual right, but are propped only by arbitrary power and the bayonet that ever surround the throne of tyranny. Sir, I have but to add that if it be the purpose of this Congress to practice that retrenchment so often and so long promised, there can be found no place more fit in which to apply the pruning-knife than in this tinselled frippery, that is but the merest and most meaningless of shams. Abolish your diplomatic pageantry, and it will not be the first time that effete and pretentious European royalty has been shocked and startled by practical American simplicity. To this it must and will come at last.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. BLOUNT.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi failed to reserve the portion of his time which he did not himself occupy.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think that makes no difference according to the practice of the House.

Mr. ATKINS. Before the gentleman from Georgia commences his remarks I suggest that it might be well to extend the time for this general debate that it may occupy the balance of this day. I do not think anything else will be done to-day.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let us go on under the order which has been made.

Mr. ATKINS. How long does the gentleman wish to speak?

Mr. BLOUNT. Only ten minutes.

Mr. ATKINS. Very well.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would not have one word to say in relation to the bill now before the House but for the speech which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] has just delivered. Of fifteen members of a committee, gentlemen of intelligence, who have bestowed laborious care on the matters presented to this House, that gentleman alone seems to dissent from the provisions of the bill; and he appears to put his fourteen colleagues in the attitude of simply copying the old consular and diplomatic bill and recommending that to this House.

Now, sir, in relation to this service I desire to say, in the first place, whatever errors there may be in this bill as to the salaries of ministers or of consuls this Committee on Appropriations are not responsible for them. The gentleman refers to the Revised Statutes as setting forth the salaries of these ministers and consuls, and then turns to this bill to show the contradiction existing between it and the provisions of the law prescribing those salaries, ignoring, or perhaps not having had his attention called to, the fact that those very salaries are not fixed by the Revised Statutes; that they have all been revised and rearranged since the revision of the statutes, by what is known as the Orth bill, in the Forty-third Congress.

The very instance he mentioned, of the consul at Goderich, Canada, the gentleman will find, if he will turn to the Orth bill, is provided for in that bill. And so with regard to many other instances in which the gentleman has charged the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] and through him the Committee on Appropriations, with being guilty of gross blunders.

It will be remembered by those who have been in this House continuously since the Forty-third Congress that the Committee on Foreign Affairs, from which such legislation should come, has never submitted any proposition for revising these salaries. Although that is the committee specially charged with our foreign intercourse, and is composed of able and intelligent men, the members of that committee have never discovered the defects of which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] now complains, and I undertake to say that many of his difficulties will disappear when we come to discuss this bill by paragraphs.

These being fixed by law, an attempt was made in the Forty-third Congress to reduce them, which attempt failed on account of a disagreement with the Senate, not only with the republican but the democratic members of that body. From the very hour when the democratic party came into possession of this House, it has been found that their own party at the other end of the Capitol was not in harmony with them in relation to the reduction of these salaries. I think the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] has done well in saying to the Committee on Appropriations that it would be useless to undertake this revision now, and that we had better take these salaries as fixed by law, ascertain the amounts, insert them in a bill, and bring that bill before this House.

Time and again has this question of the salaries both of ministers and consuls been assailed in this House, and by none more so than the distinguished gentleman who is now at the head of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, [Mr. COX.] But he himself has never, nor has any member of his committee ever, proposed any reduction of those salaries.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] in his comments upon the fees of consuls, in reply to a question which I asked him whether or not he would take the fees as the basis of a rigid rule by which he would fix the salaries of consuls and consular agents, answered that until some one else gave him some reason for some other rule he should adhere to that one. And so he arraigns this bill and arraigns the Committee on Appropriations because no one has informed him of any other rule.

Now, if the gentleman will read sections 4079, 4081, 728, 5280, and 1213 of the Revised Statutes he will find that provision is made there in many instances for consuls for judicial labors at ports where the burdens growing out of the service are far greater than those from which the amount of consular fees are obtained. So when the Forty-third Congress came to investigate this question they found the very difficulty which the gentleman from Kentucky complains of confronting them. They found that there were peculiar reasons applying to these cases. So I say that neither the gentleman from Kentucky nor the Committee on Appropriations can undertake to say that they are familiar with our foreign service in all its details.

As the consular service affects especially the commercial relations of this country, it should be handled delicately. We should not rush forward precipitately when the Committee on Foreign Affairs stands aloof from it, and when nothing has come from the State Department or from any source which would give us particular information to enable us to consider this whole subject in all its details. It certainly has not been considered in that way by the Committee on Appropriations. And because forsooth there may be unquestionable difficulties presented to the mind of the gentleman from Kentucky, I think the House had rather not take that as a reason for following him, but will rather presume from the action of this Government in its foreign intercourse, and from the fact that the several Committees on Foreign Affairs of our preceding Houses have failed to recommend any changes in this regard, that the Committee on Appropriations might not be as well informed as they ought to be to justify them in undertaking to make changes in this service. For that reason the persons having this matter especially in charge have accepted the service as it stands.

In my judgment it would be wholly improper for this House to undertake, without the recommendation of any committee, to disturb this law in one jot or one tittle. I remember when the subject of these salaries, after having been carefully considered, was reported to this House by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH]—I remember that there sat on this side of the House and on that side many gentlemen of ability who examined this bill in all its particulars, and it was passed through this House almost without a dissenting voice.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I would like to ask one question.

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] whether the appropriation to carry out our neutrality acts has not been contained in our appropriation bills for the last three or four years, and whether the gentleman himself has not voted for it without making any objection?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will answer that in one word. The appropriation bills for the last three years have contained that provision; and that I take it is the reason why it is found in this bill, for the one bill is copied from the others. I have no doubt I voted for it, for it was when I was not a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and was following blindly the Committee on Appropriations and voting for copied bills, without any information as to their effect. That is the very thing which this morning I have endeavored to protect the members of this House against, who are not members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman admits that he voted for that provision from time to time, and has just now discovered that it is wrong.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I voted for it just as others in this House would have voted for this bill upon its being presented and recommended by the gentleman from Mississippi, without knowing anything about it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. One word. The Secretary of State has asked $15,000 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the neutrality act. Some years the amount required for this purpose is more and some years less. Expenditures of this kind vary from year to year. For instance, for the relief of shipwrecked seamen the amount required the year before last was thirty to forty thousand dollars, last year $60,000, and this year the amount will be even more. We cannot estimate to the very dollar the amount necessary for these contingent expenses; it is utterly impossible it should be done.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman tell me what the expenditure for this purpose was last year?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman read the amount to the House to-day, and I did not contradict him.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I know that I called on the gentleman to furnish to the House information which he did not seem to possess.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Well, if I did not furnish it, it was because I found the gentleman needed more help than I could give him. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes of the time allowed for general debate remain.

Mr. BLOUNT. As other gentlemen desire to speak, I will not occupy further time.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, I do not belong to the Committee on Appropriations; and I am not in any way responsible for this bill either in system or detail. In the absence of investigation and discussion on the general subject, I am not prepared to say that no better system of diplomatic representation could be provided than we now have, but I am ready to affirm that the men who now occupy and have in the past occupied prominent positions in our diplomacy have well deserved all the compensation they have received from the public Treasury. For the proof of my assertion I point to the records of American history, and I challenge contradiction when I say that the American diplomatic service from the commencement of our Government has been as respectable and as successful as any that the civilized world has known, and that it has contributed more than our people are apt to realize to the progress of our Government and to the safety of our institutions.

It was to an American minister in France that we owed that interposition of her government which consummated the Independence of the American colonies. To an American minister abroad we owed the acquisition of Florida and of Louisiana with the great States and Territories which have been carved out of them. To the American ministers in France and in England during our civil war we were indebted for the fact that foreign interference did not complicate the miseries of that great struggle and expose the fair fields of the whole country to the desolation and danger which follow in the track of foreign invaders.

This much, Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to say on the general subject; but I would not have risen at this time but for the slighting allusion of the gentleman from Kentucky to one distinguished name. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, in all the records of our diplomatic history there appears no nobler career than that which Mr. Washburne fulfilled while he was the American minister in Paris. He was charged with extraordinary duties, and we all know how he fulfilled them under extraordinary circumstances in a way to earn the gratitude and challenge the admiration of civilized Europe. When the war between Germany and France broke out there were gathered in the capital of imperial France the élite of European diplomacy.

Their roll glittered with historic names, and was rich with the blazonry of arms and orders. They represented the spirit, were clothed with the dignity, charged with the duties, and invested with the powers, of civilized Europe. Amid them all the unpretending name and simple character of the American minister were not then likely to attract the attention of the thoughtless or the proud. But during the year which followed France and Paris became the theater of scenes which commanded the attention of the world and tried the qualities of all who were present or had part in them. When that year was passed there was but one name on all that lofty roll which seemed to be written in letters of living light, but one figure which stood boldly out to challenge the respect and command the admiration of the world, the embodiment of the liberal views of our Government and of the comprehensive civilization of our people. The American minister was at once the representative of liberty and of law, of progress and civilization. Amid the fierce convulsions, where were dissolved and lost the influences of human reason, the securities of government, and the bonds of civil society, he alone remained, the sole representative guardian and protector of religion and of humanity. The forms, the traditions, the courtesies, the securities of diplomatic intercourse were swept away amid the wild confusion, but he supplied forms by actions, traditions by ideas, courtesies by kindness, securities by courage, until he seemed to stand before the nations amid the wreck of governments and the ruins of society as the sole representative of Christian civilization, while the élite of European diplomacy were dwarfed and belittled before the stature, life-size, of American manhood.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a period of which all Americans are justly proud—a period which opened the eyes of civilized Europe to our character and rightful influence among the nations of the earth; and I could not hear any, even the slightest, reflection upon the career of Mr. Washburne while he was our representative in Paris without rising to spread upon the record of the American Congress my appreciation of his services, not only to both the governments and peoples which he there represented, but to civilization and to humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] surely will be fair enough not to seem to put me in any false position by making it appear that I was making any attack upon the then minister to Paris. I did not refer to him either in terms of approbation or censure.

Mr. ROBESON. I understood the gentleman to say that Mr. Washburne, while minister to Paris, had employed a son as under-secretary of legation, and at the same time permitted him to be the agent of a traveling circus.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; what I said was this: Not seeking to reflect upon the then minister to Paris in any way but to demonstrate to the House the utter absurdity of a second secretary of legation, because of the absence of any duty, I said that the then minister of Paris had his son employed as his second secretary of legation, and that amid his multitudinous duties as such second secretary the son found opportunity to engage as one of the published promoters, managers, and directors of a saw-dust performance commonly known and denominated a "circus;" and that in consequence of this fact he was very summarily dismissed as second secretary of legation. That statement I think the gentleman will not question.

Mr. ROBESON. I do not question anything the gentleman deliberately says. From my personal knowledge of him as well as from the experience of the last week, I will say I believe he would never "falsify the record" a hair's breadth upon any matter. All I said was because I thought his remarks were made with the idea of a little depreciating the service of Mr. Washburne while minister to France.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, would it be any more fair, and I put it to the gentleman from New Jersey on his candor, for him to so construe what I said as to conclude that I did not want to promote the chances of that distinguished gentleman for the impending republican presidential nomination than it would be for me, in the light of his eulogium, to say I was disposed to infer that the gentleman from New Jersey did want to make him the republican candidate?

Mr. ROBESON. I desire, in answer to what the gentleman has said, to say that I have no political or personal relations with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois to whom he has referred. I have only recited a proud episode in the history of our country.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I frankly admit I do not want him nominated.

Mr. ROBESON. I can only say that a suggestion reached my mind, which the gentleman himself might not have intended, that our minister at the court of St. Cloud had failed of something in his glorious career in Paris, and I could not refrain from making the answer I have made.

Mr. BLACKBURN. On the contrary, I stated he was a credit to the country.

Mr. ROBESON. And I have taken these five minutes to set that matter right if it needed it, and to warn the gentleman and his associates that there is a large body of American citizens who are jealous of the name of Washburne, and who will feel deeply any injustice toward any one who bears it.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I demand the regular order of business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for general debate has now closed, and the bill will be read by paragraph for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, namely:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia, at $17,500 each, $70,000.

Mr. ORTH. I move to strike out the last word.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to enter upon a defense of the diplomatic system of this Government, a system coeval with our history, and which has met and still meets with the approval of the best judgment of the country. Such has been the case under every administration from that of Washington to the present hour. Nor do I believe that this system so interwoven with our history, so thoroughly connected with our intercourse with the civilized nations of the earth, is at all likely to be disturbed or materially changed. But inasmuch as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] has alluded to the action of the Forty-third Congress in reference to our consular system and my connection with it, I feel that I am called upon to state in a few words the action of the Forty-third Congress in regard to this system, and especially so as I perceive from the debate here to-day that there is quite a misconception in reference to our consular system, both generally and its details.

Prior to the Forty-third Congress the Secretary of State had called the attention of Congress to the necessity of a thorough reorganization of that system. At that time I had the honor to be the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and the duty of examining these recommendations devolved on that committee. I gave the matter considerable attention with all the light I could obtain both from the State Department and the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury. The result was the passage by this House without a dissenting voice, and the passage of the same bill in the Senate without a dissenting voice, of the system which now obtains, after a most thorough examination and equally thorough discussion. The system then revised and established made radical changes, increasing salaries at certain points, decreasing them at others. It readjusted the salaries of persons then holding consular positions, and thus enlisting to some extent the interest of their friends in both Houses of Congress. Opposition was therefore naturally expected, but so favorably was the revision then regarded that it encountered no opposition in either House.

The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky labors under a misapprehension when he lays down as a rule that the salary of a consul should be measured by the amount of fees received by him as such consul. We have representing us abroad two classes of consuls: the first judicial and the second commercial. Judicial consuls are sent by us to the non-Christian countries of the world, such as Turkey, Siam, China, Japan; and in those countries the duties are almost exclusively of a judicial character. Hence, we pay, for instance, to the three consuls in the Barbary States $3,000 a year salary; whereas the consular fees in all the Barbary States, if I recollect aright, are probably less than $500. Why do we pay those salaries? In order to command legal talent commensurate with the duties of the office. What are those duties? Whenever an American is called by business or pleasure to these states or to any non-Christian city, such as Cairo in Egypt or Constantinople in Turkey, and has some difficulty with a resident subject of such non-Christian country, such American citizen goes for protection to his "judicial" consul, and the consul is authorized to open and hold a consular court, having in attendance the proper executive officers similar to like officers in our courts, and he renders his judgment, and it is just as effectual as any judgment rendered by the courts in this District of Columbia.

The gentleman from Kentucky has referred to the consulate at Bangkok, in Siam, as having an unusually large salary. This would be so if you were to measure the salary by the amount of fees he receives, but it is not the purpose of his office nor that of any other "judicial" consul merely to collect commercial fees, but mainly to exercise judicial functions for the protection of the lives and liberties and property of American citizens in those countries.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. I trust there will be no objection to my yielding my time to the gentleman from Indiana to conclude what he has to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BLACKBURN. As the gentleman has already been interrupted, would it interrupt him further if I would ask him a question?

Mr. ORTH. No, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does not the gentleman know that under the bill now before the House and under the consular bill of the last year there were many consuls of this country abroad serving on salaries of $1,500 or $2,000 where the fees from their offices amounted to thirty or forty thousand dollars per year? If the gentleman does not I can refer him to some.

Mr. AIKEN. I would like to ask whether we are proceeding now under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. We are now proceeding under the five-minute rule. The Chair will state that he recognized the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] who yielded his five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ORTH.]

Mr. AIKEN. As this has been done without objection I shall not object now, but hereafter I shall object.

Mr. ORTH. In response to the question of the gentleman from Kentucky I will say to him that I am aware of the fact he states. I am aware, also, that the trade and commerce of this country with foreign governments is continually changing. I remember this instance: I think probably in 1870 the consulate at Aix-la-Chapelle, in Germany, was one of the second class of European consulates while Barmen and Crefeld were merely consular agencies in the vicinity, being towns of but little manufacturing importance. Now, these conditions are exactly reversed. Barmen and Crefeld are manufacturing towns of increased importance, while Aix-la-Chapelle has simply a consular agency.

Our "commercial" consuls, if I may be allowed to use that term, are again divided into those which are called "salaried" and those which are "fee" consuls. Salaried consuls are generally at those points where large fees are collected, or at sea-ports, where our shipping interests require consular attention and protection.

It is within the memory, Mr. Chairman, of many members of this House when the consul at Liverpool, under the old system, received in fees a larger amount than the salary of the President of the United States. That excess has all been remedied, and now at all the large consulates, even where the fees collected amount to from five to twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars, we have "salaried" consuls, with salaries ranging from fifteen hundred to six or seven thousand dollars. A few consulates under the bill of the Forty-third Congress—and I do not think it has been changed by this—are "salaried" at points where fees are less than $1,000, but generally where the fees received are less than $1,000 the consul retains the fees for his services. A consulate but recently established at a point where American enterprise and industry is beginning to seek a new market or a more extended field of operations may pay for the first few years only a nominal compensation, but will gradually increase in importance, with a like increase in consular duties and consular fees. I remember the consulate at Budapest, in Hungary, filled recently by a friend of mine, now deceased, was worth probably only about $240 during the last year. I have no question that inside of five years that remote consulate on the Danube will become worth, by increased commercial intercourse with that interesting country and equally interesting people, from one thousand to fifteen hundred dollars, and will then pass from the "fee" to the "salaried" consulates under our present laws.

Again, the gentleman from Kentucky has talked to us about the "consular agents" and their disposition and their opportunities for defrauding the Government of the United States. What is a "consular agent?" The gentleman from Kentucky has not informed this House. I presume he has a clear perception of it, but if so he has not left a clear impression upon the House. For illustration, let me remark that there is a consulate at the town of A. Twenty miles distant therefrom is the town of B, where there is a manufacturing establishment with which some enterprising American merchant may desire to do business in the way of purchasing and importing its manufactured goods. The consul at A is not able to attend to it conveniently, or his other duties may engross all his time, and therefore he appoints a person to act as his "consular agent" at the town of B, who attends to the particular business growing out of that special manufacturing establishment, but all the papers go from the consul or agent at B to the consul at A, and thence to the proper custom-house, the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury; and there is no more opportunity of defrauding the Government at the hands of any consular agent than there is at the hands of any "feed" or "salaried" consul. Charges of fraud are easily made, but in many cases exist only in imagination. Our consular system has been remarkably free from any just charge of peculation or wrong-doing, and needs the fostering care of the Government because it, more than any other agency, is best calculated to extend and increase our commercial relations with the world.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I desire to renew the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I did not hear all of the remarks of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] and therefore cannot pass judgment upon his positions with reference to this bill. I have risen for the purpose of controverting one assertion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] as to the necessity of maintaining the diplomatic service. I am one of those who believe that the necessity for the diplomatic missions, so far as this country is concerned, has entirely passed away. I am in favor of enlarging and making more efficient the consular system, for I believe that all the necessity we have for agents abroad can be accomplished through the consulates.

The duties of the diplomatic officers relate mainly to political affairs, while that of the consulates appertain to commercial relations between this and foreign countries. Now, the immensely productive resources of this country clearly demonstrate that we should omit no means to open the way for our surplus products into every market of the world. For the purpose of protecting and extending our commerce with foreign nations it is necessary that we should employ consular and commercial agents. In looking over our consular service I find room for improvement. I believe we can greatly advance the material interest of this country by an enlargement of this service, and I shall be willing to follow the lead of any one who is able to devise methods for its efficiency. Every agriculturist, mechanic, and manufacturer is interested in the extension of our foreign commerce and the efficiency of our consular service.

But, sir, the diplomatic service can only be useful for political purposes. The ocean that divides us from the old countries and the dissimilarity of our institutions with those of Europe, Asia, or Africa, render it entirely unnecessary that we should interpose or be concerned in the political affairs of those countries. Our peace, happiness, and prosperity will be more effectively promoted by an avoidance of diplomatic relations with the nations of those continents. With this in view, I did, on the 7th of January last, introduce into the House a resolution instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill for our action which will abolish all our diplomatic missions and their expensive appendages. Because of the lack of time that committee has not yet been able to perfect a measure for that purpose. Had it not been for some remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] in advocacy of the necessity of that branch of the public service I would not have participated in this debate. Of what advantage are envoys extraordinary and ministers resident to us? Read their communications to the State Department and tell me what of any value do you find which was not anticipated by the metropolitan press long prior to the arrival of those dispatches.

Any one of the great dailies of New York gives us all the important political and commercial events of the nations of Europe and, indeed, of the known world during the preceding day.

The intelligent thought of this country has long seen the absurdity and the wasteful expenditure of public money to maintain played-out politicians in their flunkysim and disgusting struggles for the privilege of precedent and social distinction in Europe.

Electricity has placed our Secretary of State within twenty-four hours' communication with every court in Europe. Diplomatic representatives were needless during the days of travel by sailing-vessels and slow coaches, and, indeed, I have no doubt are necessary among imperial governments to-day, but the diplomatic institution of this country is at variance with common sense and democratic governmental theory. In fact it has been tolerated and maintained mainly because of the power of custom.

In all countries where the people share in the government a strong antagonism exists to the useless expenditure of money on this effete institution. If this service should be dispensed with no difficulty will be experienced in arranging treaties or other important commercial or political transactions with foreign governments through the agency of special commissioners; but in ordinary political matters

I apprehend our consulates will be found capable of guarding our political as well as commercial interests. Indeed, most of our treaties with foreign governments have been negotiated by special envoys.

In bringing this subject before Congress I simply obeyed the teachings of the fathers as well as the result of my own study of the subject. Washington, Jefferson, Gallatin, and Livingston left it as an injunction to us that we should avoid all participation in European political affairs, and withdraw as soon as practicable our foreign ministers. In 1842 Mr. John Quincy Adams introduced a similar resolution to that of my own: and Benton, in his great work, urged that this subject should be taken up and pressed to final success. The time has now arrived to consummate this object.

My friend from Indiana has read the history of our country to little purpose if he has not learned from the teachings of our ablest statesmen of the past that a time would come when the progress of science and art would find the means for superseding and dispensing with this useless and expensive service. It was the opinion of Washington that we should avoid having any relations with the complicated political affairs of Europe. It was the opinion of Mr. Gallatin in his day that we should entirely dispense with every foreign minister abroad. It was the opinion of Mr. Livingston and others whom I will not stop to enumerate.

Mr. BLOUNT. And how many were there on the other side?

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Now when we have the judgment of men like Washington, and Gallatin, and John Quincy Adams, and Thomas H. Benton, and find to-day the foreign mission service is but an asylum for played-out politicians, and that it costs the people of this country, already bending beneath heavy taxation, $400,000 annually, it is time for us, as we are all advocates—at least on this side—of an economical administration of the Government, to dispense with this unnecessary service. This would curtail the entire expenditures of the consular and diplomatic service at least one-third.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCCOOK. I desire to suggest that it would be an act of charity to the gentleman from Illinois to retain the law as it now is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I did not hear the remark of the gentleman from New York. I should like to hear what the gentleman had to say. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. MCCOOK. What I said was, it would be an act of charity to the gentleman from Illinois to retain the existing system in the event of the democratic party coming into power.

Mr. MORTON. Is the gentleman from Illinois aware that the great burden to which he refers as resting upon the people of the United States for the support of its diplomatic representatives at all the nations of the world amounts to less than one cent per capita?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] has been recognized.

Mr. MONROE. I rise to oppose the pro forma amendment.

I desire to notice one point made by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] in the speech which he delivered this afternoon. I waited until now because I had myself been so generously treated by the House in regard to time that I did not like to interrupt the gentleman from Kentucky. The point is one of very great interest in the diplomatic history of our country.

The gentleman remarked that our minister in London, General Schenck, succeeded in reconciling the English Government to his views by giving up the very question in issue. I think my friend will discover on looking over the diplomatic correspondence of the period that he is mistaken on that point. The question at issue between our Government and that of Great Britain, was not so much that our nation demanded money for indirect claims. Our Government said repeatedly through its Secretaries of State and ministers that it had no anxiety about pecuniary compensation for indirect losses; but what it did want and thought of importance to this country and to all countries was, that the question whether a nation should be held responsible for indirect claims should go before the Geneva tribunal and be decided. The demand of our Government was that that question should be submitted to that tribunal, and should be there determined. That was the object our Government was aiming at; and all our diplomatic correspondence shows that General Schenck understood that perfectly well.

But the difficulty was the English government were somehow suspicious of us. They did not want that question submitted. They were afraid it would be made an excuse for some immense award of many millions of money. Now, the good office which General Schenck performed for his country at that crisis was this, that by his manliness, by his frankness, by his great ability, by his frequent conferences with Lord Granville, then English minister for foreign affairs, he succeeded in getting the confidence, as between man and man, of the British minister. He did a work which could never have been done except by a minister residing in London and constantly meeting in friendly social intercourse the members of the British cabinet. The important point was to have this great question decided, because General Schenck and the Government he represented believed there was no country in the world at the present day that would profit more by the doctrine that civilized governments are not responsible for indirect losses than would the United States.

As a matter of fact the decision of the Geneva tribunal on this question was worth a great deal more to this broad commercial land of ours than any amount of British gold could have been. The decision that was made by that tribunal is to-day as satisfactory as it could be on that question. What General Schenck feared and what America feared was that the English government would withdraw its representation at the Geneva tribunal when this question of indirect claims was submitted there; but he succeeded in winning the confidence of that government and holding them to the work prescribed by the treaty of Washington; and thus that treaty, with all its beneficent consequences, was saved for our country and for mankind.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. NICHOLLS. I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I renew it, and I ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. NICHOLLS] to bear with me a moment. I find that I am a second time called upon to enter a disclaimer. I certainly did not intend, and I here repeat it, by any reference that I made to the want of any necessity for second secretaries of legation, as illustrated in the case of the second secretary of legation of Mr. Washburne when minister at Paris, to reflect in any wise upon that gentleman. And I certainly was as far from intending by anything I said to-day to detract from the fairness or the candor or to impeach or impugn the scholarly character of the speech made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] the other day in advocacy of this bill. I surely had no purpose in anything I said to reflect upon the then minister to London, General Schenck. I am aware of the well-earned prominence that that gentleman attained by reason of his ability during the stormiest era of his country's history. I would not under any circumstances, and especially under the circumstances that surround him now, utter one word that would be calculated to derogate from the position which he has fairly earned. Everybody acknowledges his prominent and eminent abilities.

I meant simply, by my reference to that transaction connected with the Geneva award, to which my friend from Ohio [Mr. MONROE] had adverted, to demonstrate the utter uselessness of this foreign diplomatic service; to show that it was there stated, and frankly and fairly stated, that the best efforts of one of the ablest men that within the last half century has represented this Government at the court of Saint James were expended upon an issue that involved the admission or rejection of what were known as the indirect claims to the Geneva tribunal. The American Government insisted that these indirect claims for damages should be considered; the British government denied the legitimacy of those claims. The exertions of General Schenck were directed to that issue. I doubt not he did all that any representative could have done to secure their consideration. But the stubborn fact still stares us in the face that he failed; and the adjustment of our difficulties was only had when every one of those indirect claims was excluded from consideration.

Now, while I am on the floor, I want to answer a question propounded to me by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] which in the confusion occasioned by the multiplicity of questions by which I was then encompassed I failed to answer. The gentleman asked me what consular clerk had been appointed to a port for which no consul was provided by this bill. I will answer him and tell him that it is the port of Collingwood, Canada.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Then you have changed your ground.

Mr. BLACKBURN. No, sir; I have changed nothing.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. You said Goderich.

Mr. BLACKBURN. If the gentleman will permit me I will state that the consulate at Goderich had been abolished, but in the consular and diplomatic bill of 1878 it was provided for, but no provision was ever submitted to this House for its re-establishment. I said it was contained in this bill without any reason assigned for it.

I said there was a consulate to which a clerk was accredited and whose salary was provided for by law, but this bill provided for no consul at that place. I now tell the gentleman that that port is Collingwood, Canada. Now, if the gentleman will take the Congressional Directory for the Forty-sixth Congress and turn to page 144 he will find that in obedience to the act of Congress approved June 20, 1864, thirteen consular clerks have been appointed, which number the gentleman recognizes and provides for in the bill now under consideration. One of those clerks is Mr. Gustavus Goward, and he is the consular clerk at Collingwood, Canada. But the bill of the gentleman does not provide for any consul at that place, and presents the anomaly of a consular clerk without a consul.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. NICHOLLS. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to offer a substantial amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President is authorized to appoint as counselor of legation, to serve without compensation, any fit person who shall have previously served as secretary of legation of the United States.

He may appoint fit persons as attachés of legation, who shall serve without compensation. Any such appointee shall, under the control of the Secretary of State, be subject to the direction of the chief of the mission where he shall be employed. Such appointments are subject at any time to revocation by the President.

The CHAIRMAN. Where does the gentleman propose to have his amendment come in?

Mr. NICHOLLS. I desire to offer it as a separate clause. It does not seem to apply to any particular part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that it might come in after line 11 of the bill.

Mr. NICHOLLS. Very well; I offer it as an independent clause, to come in after line 11.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to reserve all points of order on this amendment.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point of order now that the amendment changes existing law, and does not reduce expenditures. I admit that it does not increase them, but certainly it does not diminish them.

Mr. BLOUNT. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] will allow me to reserve the point of order. This amendment, I understand, comes from the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and I hope my colleague [Mr. NICHOLLS] will be heard upon it.

Mr. ATKINS. I make the point.

Mr. NICHOLLS. The counsel whose employment this amendment would authorize will receive no compensation beyond the position which the appointment may give. Our information is that a number of gentlemen resident in foreign countries would be glad to receive appointments of this sort, and would be of great assistance to our ministers resident. I think there can be no objection to the proposition. It involves no cost to the Government. It is a proposition to add to the efficiency of the service without any increased expense.

Mr. ATKINS. The amendment is subject to a point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does this amendment come from the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. NICHOLLS. It does; I am instructed by that committee to report it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. NICHOLLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ATKINS. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I should have been very glad to have had the privilege of responding to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] during the progress of the general debate; but I was so unfortunate as to reserve no time to myself, and therefore I must take advantage of the five-minute debate to reply as rapidly as I can. The gentleman in the course of his remarks stated that though we have no consul at Goderich yet we allow for a clerk there.

Mr. BLACKBURN rose.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman may not have meant to say this; but I think the notes of the reporters will show that he did say it. I state as a fact that at Goderich we have provided for no consul and no clerk. I ask the gentleman to point out, if he can, any part of the bill where there is any such provision. Then the gentleman makes the same criticism as to Collingwood, that while there is no consul there we have provided for a clerk.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman surely does not want to misrepresent me.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I do not.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Does not the act of June 20, 1864, provide for thirteen consular clerks to be appointed and assigned by the President? And I find that one has been assigned to Collingwood.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Let the gentleman take the bill and see whether we have provided for such a clerk. The bill was what the gentleman criticized.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Here is provision in the bill for salaries for thirteen consular clerks. Now cannot the President under the law of 1864 assign a clerk to Collingwood?

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, what is the question before the House?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. There is no clerk allowed in this bill at any such place as Collingwood. The gentleman, by the blunders into which he fell in the course of his speech, reminds me very much of a man who coming to a turbid stream pitches in and flounders around without knowing where he is going to land.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit that the question which the gentleman is discussing is not now before the committee; we shall reach that part of the bill after a while.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will allow me to manage this matter in my own way.

Mr. BLOUNT. I must hold the gentleman to the rules. My colleague [Mr. NICHOLLS] offered an amendment upon which I have reserved a point of order; and now the gentleman is passing off upon another subject.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman, considering the range he takes in debate, is very technical all at once. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I insist on my point of order against the amendment of my colleague. I submit that it does not retrench expenditures and changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is subject to the point of order.

Mr. ORTH. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, have I been taken from the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi occupied his five minutes, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] has been recognized.

Mr. ORTH. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN], in discussing the provisions of this bill prior to the close of the general debate, referred to the amount of $4,000 appropriated as salary for the agent and consul-general at Cairo, Egypt, and complained that this is a most exorbitant salary to be paid at a point where the Government receives probably $200 or $300 for fees. This statement, if unexplained, would leave upon the mind of the House a wrong impression. The agent and consul-general at Cairo is the only officer of that character in the employ of this Government. He is emphatically sui generis. He exercises quasi diplomatic functions at the court of the Khedive in Egypt, and his diplomatic powers are of such importance that, instead of his receiving merely a salary of $4,000, it would comport better with the dignity of this Government and of the position to place him upon an equality, in respect to pay, with a minister resident, because he possesses the diplomatic power of a minister resident. He is not a consul in any just sense of that term. I hold in my hand the Consular Regulations prepared and issued by the State Department, and here upon the first page, in the second paragraph, it will be found that he is designated as "agent and consul-general," and who enjoys, as I have said, a quasi diplomatic position, so far as the Sublime Porte may consent thereto. He must be a person of more than ordinary capacity, and hence we pay him $4,000.

Now, then, the gentleman complains again that this bill provides for paying "an agent at Collingwood." If there is any officer at all there I would understand him to be known as a "commercial agent." A commercial agent is a different officer from that of consul, whether feed or salaried, commercial or judicial. He is a person specially appointed by the President to attend to a special duty at a particular place. He is appointed by the President without the consent of the Senate. He exercises his duty without having received from the government of the country in which he exercises his functions an "exequatur" authorizing him to discharge his duty at that particular place. Such, doubtless, is the "commercial agent" at Collingwood, in Canada. Under the Constitution the President is authorized to appoint ambassadors, ministers, and consuls. The only question coming before Congress is a question of payment of their salaries. You may refuse to appropriate money for a minister at St. James or St. Cloud, but the President can send them and keep them there without reference to the question of payment of salary. Congress does not create these officers. We simply provide for their salaries. And even if we do not pay them the President's power to appoint them still remains under the Constitution.

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn. The Clerk read as follows:

For minister resident and consul-general at Bolivia, $5,000.

Mr. BELFORD. I move to strike out $5,000 and in lieu thereof to insert $7,500, and I should like to state in reference to this—

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I rise to a point of order on that amendment. It is not in order, as it changes the law and increases the amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. BELFORD. I move then to strike out the last word. I offer that amendment, Mr. Chairman, because I desire to call the attention of the House to a few facts in reference to the Bolivian mission. In 1875 the minister resident at Bolivia was allowed $7,500, and I believe he was allowed that amount in 1876. Then that mission was dropped from the law. In 1878 it was restored and the minister's salary was fixed at $5,000. It seemed to me only an act of justice he should receive the same salary accorded prior to 1876. I find in this bill the ministers resident at Belgium, Netherlands, and Sweden and Norway are each allowed the sum of $7,500. A citizen of my State has lately been appointed to that post by the President, and I should like to see him get a salary sufficient to cover his wants.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I should be glad to gratify my friend personally, but I cannot consent to it.

Mr. MCCOOK. There is a better reason than the one stated by the gentleman from Colorado for increasing the salary of the minister at Bolivia to $7,500. In the Forty-fifth Congress, Mr. Hewitt, who had charge of this bill—

The CHAIRMAN. There is no question before the committee.

Mr. MCCOOK. Then, I move to strike out the last two words. In the Forty-fifth Congress, Mr. Hewitt was on the committee that had charge of this same bill, making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and delivered a speech in regard to it. While personally I differ with many things he said, yet that speech evidently was made after a careful study of our whole diplomatic and consular system, and is exhaustive of this question. He there, it seems to me, antagonizes almost everything which has been said to-day by my friend from Kentucky, who appears unable to find any good in it. Mr. Hewitt did not hesitate to criticize, but he certainly was not disposed to destroy, a system that, whatever its faults, has many and unquestioned merits.

In regard to this Bolivian mission, he gave reasons why it should be restored to its former rank in language so clear and convincing that I will quote it, as much better than anything I can say myself; and it applies with equal force to other missions:

Therefore the Committee on Appropriations not only did not strike out any South American mission, but they inserted two missions which had been left out before; the one to the United States of Colombia, where we have a commerce amounting even now to $10,000,000 per annum, and the other to Bolivia, where the mission was discontinued some years ago.

The reason for inserting the mission to Bolivia I should like to have understood. Bolivia has no sea-port; it has communication with the ocean, but no port through which traffic can be carried on; it is, in fact, cut off from the Pacific Ocean by the Andes chain of mountains, through which it has no practicable pass; but it has an outlet through the Amazon River; and a contract has been made by the Brazilian government with an American firm of contractors to construct a railway two hundred miles in length around the falls of the Madeira, a branch of the Amazon River, which will allow the products of that vast country, the ancient seat of the Aztec civilization, to come down the Amazon and pass out into the general markets of the world.

That opening is confided to American hands. Thousands of our enterprising people are already there or on their way to engage in the execution of this great undertaking. This work will be put through, and the men whom we send will need protection. That class of men are the men who always develop the trade and the resources of a country, and will pour its volume into American channels, if they can be adequately protected. Hence we inserted this mission to Bolivia.

Possibly the reason assigned there may make no impression on this present House of Representatives; but it seems to me, speaking in part for the commerce of the great city of New York and of the country, there is some good reason, at all events, why our diplomatic and consular system should be elevated to and maintained at the rank to which its importance entitles it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I propose that the committee now rise—

The Clerk continued the reading of the bill, as follows:

For minister resident accredited to Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras, Salvador, and Nicaragua, to reside at the place that the President may select in either of the states named, $10,000.

For minister resident and consul-general to Hayti, $7,500.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood the gentleman from Mississippi to make a motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman as submitting such a motion.

Mr. NEAL. I offer the following amendment:

After line 31 insert "for minister resident to Portugal, $5,000."

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that we cannot get through this bill to-day, especially in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky that he will offer a number of amendments, and I move, therefore, that the committee rise.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It is Saturday, and within a few moments of four o'clock. I hope, therefore, the motion will be agreed to.

Mr. SPARKS. I hope the committee will not rise. We spent three months to adopt the rules—

Mr. BLACKBURN. How long would it take the gentleman to learn the rules?

Mr. SPARKS. I never will learn them, or anybody else with sense. [Laughter.]

Mr. NEAL. I hope I will be allowed to proceed for a few moments before the committee rises.

It will be observed that in line 36 a chargé d'affaires is appointed to Portugal. My object in offering the amendment is to change the rank of that officer and make him a minister resident.

A MEMBER. And increase his pay.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. Does not the gentleman know that Egypt is not a sovereignty?

Mr. NEAL. I am not speaking of Egypt but of Portugal. If the gentleman had listened to me he would have known it. We are represented at that court by Benjamin Moran, one of the most accomplished gentlemen in the diplomatic service of the United States. He has been in that service continuously for thirty-five years.

Mr. BLOUNT. I did not hear the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, but I desire to reserve the point of order upon it.

Mr. NEAL. Very well.

Mr. BLOUNT. There was so much confusion that I was unable to make the point at the time the amendment was read.

Mr. NEAL. I would be very glad if gentlemen will listen to what I have to say. Having had at one time the honor of representing this country in a consular capacity, I know something of the subject of which I speak.

This gentleman, now chargé d'affaires at Lisbon, as I have said, is one of the most accomplished diplomatic officers in the service of the United States and has had an experience of thirty-five years. He is not, Mr. Chairman, a "played-out politician," as the gentleman from Illinois charges all our diplomatic officers are.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. I did not include all; I spoke of a great many.

Mr. NEAL. The only object I have in view in offering this amendment is, that this officer of our Government may occupy a position at the court of Portugal commensurate with the dignity and power of our country. Every minister, I believe, without exception, at that court ranks our representative. Even the representatives of the smallest states of Europe and South America rank him, and it is because in my opinion the United States should be represented in that court by an officer holding at least the rank of minister resident, that he may not be humiliated himself and that Americans visiting there may not have their pride of country mortified, as well as because it is an act of justice to this most accomplished officer, that I offer this amendment. It will add nothing to the expense to our Government, but will simply place our representative on a plane of equality with not the great powers of Europe, but the secondary states of the civilized world. I therefore offer this amendment, and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I hope no change will be made in the bill. I know as soon as there is an amendment adopted changing the rank that there will be no end to amendments, and the next thing will be to increase the salaries.

Mr. BLOUNT. I made the point of order on this amendment, as will be remembered, shortly after the gentleman began his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will indicate his point of order.

Mr. BLOUNT. My point is that it changes existing law and that it increases expenditures.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman who offered the resolution agreed to the reservation of points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

The Clerk resumed the reading, as follows:

For minister resident and consul-general to Liberia, $4,000.

For chargé d'affaires ad interim and diplomatic officers abroad, $30,000.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope my amendment to strike out lines 34 and 35 of the bill will prevail. It reduces the bill, and saves to the people of this country $20,000 next year.

The consular and diplomatic bill of last year contains no such provision as this. Upon inquiring of the gentleman in charge of this bill I find that the House included such a clause in the bill of last year, but that the Senate struck it out. And hence there was no appropriation of that kind made. There has been no showing to this House that there is an exigency now which did not exist last year, demanding increased appropriation. There is no complaint that there was any detriment to the diplomatic service of last year by reason of the failure to appropriate for these purposes. Hence I think it should be stricken out. I know our consular service is of vast importance, but I do not agree with some gentlemen who have spoken on this subject with reference to the importance of our diplomatic service. We could prune it down and save half a million a year and not injure the service a particle.

Last year, it will be remembered, it was thought there was to be trouble that could not be averted in Europe. I speak of the threatened rupture between Russia and England.

What was the condition of our diplomatic service then? At that time we had no minister to England. Mr. Welch had resigned and come home. We had none in Russia; Mr. Stockton was at home. We had none in Germany; Mr. Bayard Taylor, who represented us there so honorably, was dead. Our minister to Belgium, Mr. Goodloe, was sick and absent. Our minister to Italy was sick in Florence and not at the post of his service. I do not speak of these things for the purpose of charging any dereliction on the part of our ministers, but simply to show that our diplomatic service can be dispensed with without injury. Notwithstanding all of these vacancies the world moved on all the same and they were not missed. And now the Committee on Appropriations propose here to make an additional appropriation of $20,000 for a matter for which we made no appropriation last year. Is it right for us to do it? Is it proper, in consideration of the burdens under which our people rest? It is a fact that the Government of the people of the United States costs more per capita than that of any people on earth. Even the combination of church and state in other countries does not make their taxes and the cost of maintaining them as great as ours.

A MEMBER. How was it prior to 1860?

Mr. McMILLIN. Prior to 1860 democrats ruled the country and ran it cheaper.

I hope the amendment to strike out lines 34 and 35 will be adopted. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I wish to say it has never been the voluntary desire nor the vote of this House that there should not be made an appropriation of that kind. Under the law as it exists, the secretaries of legation in the absence of the ministers are required to perform all the functions of these diplomatic officers, and by law they are entitled to receive for their services one-half amount of salaries paid to ministers they represent, but only during the period of such services.

In the last Congress this House inserted a provision to that effect in the appropriation bill as it went to the Senate. There was a difference between the two Houses in amount of about $80,000 or $90,000. In the way of compromise it was agreed by the members of the committee of conference on the part of the House that the Senate should strike out whatever seemed best to them in order to divide the difference between the two Houses. The Senate, therefore, rather than strike other matters which they deemed of more importance in the bill, struck that out. That was the only reason why it was not retained. This House agreed to the report of the committee of conference and thus it was that this appropriation failed in the last appropriation bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether any calamity befell the country on account of that appropriation being stricken out?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. Of this I cannot speak, but I am inclined to the opinion that it would be an act of gross injustice on the part of a great government like ours to require these secretaries of legation to perform all the duties and take upon them all the functions of a minister, incurring of course additional expense, and then refuse to pay them.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask my colleague on the committee to state whether this appropriation is not made under the law?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. There is a law upon the statute-book declaring that they shall be paid one-half the amount of the salaries of these ministers while performing their duties. The ministers are allowed two months' absence every year from their posts. Some person must perform these duties. It is thrown upon the secretaries of legation by law, and the same law provides that these secretaries shall have one-half the amount of salaries paid the ministers. Would it be just and honest in our Government to refuse to pay them the salaries thus provided?

Mr. McMILLIN. Let it be done by a separate bill so we may have an opportunity of scrutinizing it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to ask my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Mississippi, whether there will not be in a deficiency bill an item to cover the sum of $20,000 stricken out last year?

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. We owe them some amount by reason of our failure last year to make an appropriation, and there is no doubt in my mind that in law and in equity they are entitled to receive these salaries.

Mr. HOUSE. I hope the gentleman having the bill in charge will make the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. I prefer that we should take a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. NEAL. I move to strike out the last word.

In addition to the reasons given by the gentleman from Mississippi for retaining this item of appropriation, there is another which is quite as important in my estimation. It is this: in all countries where we have simply ministers resident or chargés d'affaires, there are no secretaries of legation, and in the absence of the diplomatic representatives consuls are required to discharge their duties. This imposes an additional and often an onerous duty upon them, for which they are entitled to a reasonable compensation. This compensation is fixed, either by law or the order of the Department of State, at an amount equal to the consular salary for the same period of time.

Taking all these circumstances into consideration, it appears to me this appropriation is a very just and proper one. It cannot be improperly or illegally drawn from the Treasury. If there is no law providing for the salaries of these officers ad interim, they cannot have it. But if there is, and they discharge the duties, in the end they will have it, whether we make the necessary appropriation or not, because that sense of justice which lives in the heart of every American will ultimately drive Congress to provide for the payment of the services rendered by these, generally the most meagerly paid of all our public servants.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. McMILLIN's amendment, there were—ayes 5, noes 50.

Mr. McMILLIN. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi. The gentleman will not insist on the point that a quorum has not voted if he be permitted to reserve the right to have a vote on his amendment in the House.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) That cannot be done except by agreement.

Mr. McMILLIN. A quorum did not vote, and I have demanded tellers unless I can have a vote on my amendment in the House.

Mr. McKENZIE. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CONVERSE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 3035) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1881, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered upon the Journal.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from Colonel George P. Buell, Fifteenth Infantry, protesting against the reinstatement in the Army of John W. Eckles, late captain Fifteenth Infantry, as contemplated by the bill (S. No. 1378) for the relief of John W. Mr. KIRKWOOD. I have here a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, directed to the Senators and Representatives from that State. It requests them to use all the influence in their power to procure such a modification of the patent laws of the United States as will relieve innocent parties using patented devices from liability to prosecution, and limiting prosecutions for infringement of our patent laws to manufacturers and vendors of articles which may be infringements of patents. I understand that the orderly mode of proceeding in regard to a resolution of this kind is to have it laid on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and laid on the table.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I desire, however, to ask the chairman of the Committee on Patents, as this is a matter in which the people of my State feel a deep interest, whether that committee is likely soon to report to the Senate any bill, either from the House or originating here, in relation to the subject of the resolution which I have just presented.

Mr. KERNAN. I will state, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator, that there is a bill which has passed the House and was referred to the Committee on Patents of the Senate on that subject. One or two bills were introduced here on the same subject and referred to that committee. Many petitions in favor of some bill of that kind are also before the committee, and certain parties from various States immediately asked to be heard and we have heard them, and I believe closed the hearing, and the committee intends and desires to take the subject up now and make a report at the earliest day.

Mr. ROLLINS presented the petition of M. S. Sargent and others, citizens of Belknap and Carroll Counties, New Hampshire, praying that a suitable appropriation be made by Congress for the improvement of the navigation of Lake Winnepesaukee, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

vent the manufacture of oleomargarine; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pella, Wise County, Texas, a petition of citizens of New York, a petition of citizens of Illinois, and a petition of citizens of Missouri, all of whom were soldiers in the late war, praying for the passage of what is known as the equalization bounty bill; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of merchants, manufacturers, and consumers of chrome iron ore and bichromate of potash in the States of Massachusetts, Ohio, Georgia, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire, praying that the prohibitory duties now levied upon these articles may be removed therefrom; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of boot and shoe dealers of Chicago, Illinois, praying for the passage of a national bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the petition of James Fairman, of Chicago, Illinois, praying that honorably discharged soldiers be given a medal of silver valued at $1 each; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented the petition of George C. Quick, of Centralia, Illinois, formerly of Captain C. Millis's Company of Mounted Rangers, in the Black Hawk War, praying for the passage of a special act of Congress granting him a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, presented the petition of C. A. Wilber and others, citizens of Alachua and Marion Counties, Florida, praying for an appropriation by Congress for the improvement of Cumberland Sound; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I present a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, relating to the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries, and as the memorial refers to a matter which is exciting much interest in Minnesota and Wisconsin, and as the memorial is brief, I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be reported at length. The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

The memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin respectfully represents:

Whereas the improvement of the Upper Mississippi River and its tributaries, by regulating the volume of water, and thereby improving the navigation of said river and tributaries in certain seasons of the year, is essential to the commercial interest of States bordering upon said river;

Whereas by the report of General H. G. Wright, Chief of Engineers, made to Hon. Alexander Ramsey, Secretary of War, dated February 6, 1880, such regulation of the volume of water can be accomplished by means of dams and reservoirs on the headwaters of said river and tributaries by the appropriation of a reasonable sum of money;

Your memorialist therefore respectfully asks that such sum of money be appropriated for that purpose as the Secretary of War may deem advisable to commence and carry on said improvements during the present year.

His excellency, the governor of Wisconsin, is hereby requested to transmit a duly authenticated copy of this memorial to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

ALEX. A. ARNOLD,
Speaker of the Assembly.
THOMAS B. SCOTT,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

STATE OF WISCONSIN,
State Department.

To all to whom these presents shall come:

I, Hans B. Warner, secretary of state of the State of Wisconsin, do hereby certify that the foregoing has been compared by me with the original in this office, and that the same is a true copy thereof, and of the whole of such original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal, at the capital, in the city of Madison, this 22d day of March, in the year of our Lord 1880.

[SEAL.]

HANS B. WARNER,
Secretary of State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. WHYTE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom were referred certain resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York suggesting the propriety of monthly publications of reports of consuls representing the United States in various countries, to report them back and ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, because of the fact that it would require the re-establishment of the Bureau of Statistics in the State Department to carry out the requests of the memorialists, and therefore this committee think it properly belongs to the Committee on Foreign Relations to make the inquiry and recommend any legislation that may be necessary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on Printing will be discharged from the further consideration of the resolutions, and they will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

No. 1547) to provide for the opening of direct trade between the States of the Mississippi Valley and Brazil, via the West Indies, and to authorize and establish a steamship mail service and express thereto; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have been requested by one of my constituents, an able lawyer, Colonel Samuel C. Reid, to introduce this bill. I do so without ever having read it, and without being committed for or against any of its provisions. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

V. Hayden; 3,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the use of the Senate, and 1,000 for the Department of the Interior.

SPANISH-AMERICAN CLAIMS COMMISSION.

Mr. WALLACE. Some weeks ago I introduced a resolution asking for information in regard to certain claims before the American and Spanish commission. That information has been furnished and is found in Executive Document No. 86. I move the reference of that document to the Committee on Foreign Relations with instructions to make such recommendations to the Senate as they may deem proper under the circumstances.

The motion was agreed to.

UTE INDIANS IN COLORADO.

Mr. ALLISON and Mr. TELLER submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them respectively to the bill (S. No. 1509) to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado, for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. COKE. I gave notice at the last meeting of the Senate that I should call up this morning Senate bill No. 1509 and ask for action upon it. The honorable Senator from Iowa has proposed amendments to that bill which were shown to me this morning. They are of great importance, and I think there should be some little time to consider them before they are acted upon. I therefore shall not ask that the bill be taken up for action this morning, but give notice that on Wednesday, after the morning hour, I shall ask the Senate to lay aside all pending orders and take up the bill for action. The honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] desires to be heard upon this bill, and if it will suit him as well to make his speech this morning I shall be glad to have the bill taken up this morning for that purpose.

Mr. TELLER. I think the bill ought to be taken up as soon as possible, because if this matter is to be settled by the passage of the bill it ought to be done at once, and if it is not, it ought to be known at once. I desire to submit my views upon the bill, and some features connected with Indian affairs. I am prepared to do so at any time, I do not care whether it is this morning or at any other time. Whenever the Senate is prepared to allow me to proceed, I am ready to submit my views upon the questions involved.

Mr. COKE. It would be satisfactory to the Committee on Indian Affairs if the Senator from Colorado should be allowed to proceed this morning. The committee would be glad to hear his views before there is another meeting, and before the amendments proposed by the Senator from Iowa are considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no formal motion in regard to the matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order. I hope we shall proceed with the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is the Calendar of General Orders.

Mr. COKE. Then I make the request that the bill be taken up for the purpose of hearing the Senator from Colorado after the morning hour.

Mr. THURMAN. I have no objection whatever to hearing the Senator from Colorado this morning provided his remarks will not extend much beyond half past one.

Mr. TELLER. I am not willing to commence a discussion of the bill and be limited. I have not detained the Senate very much usually. This is a matter of a good deal of importance to the people of the country and of especial importance to the people of Colorado; and I should not be willing to say I would conclude my remarks in an hour. I might and I might not.

Mr. THURMAN. I have only one word to say. The Senate must have observed that at least once or twice a week some Senator feels moved by the spirit to get up and complain of the Judiciary Committee or its chairman for not pressing the Geneva award bill. I have got tired of that myself, and therefore I do not feel quite at liberty to lay that bill aside unless there is some very extraordinary reason for doing so.

Mr. COKE. The Senator will allow me to say that there is a very extraordinary emergency requiring us to take action on this bill. It is urged by the Secretary of the Interior, and is absolutely necessary in order to prevent serious Indian complications. Early action is desired, and it is very important that early action should be had.

Mr. THURMAN. Then let the bill be taken up now, and let the Senator from Colorado proceed at this time. If it is of such importance it had just as well supersede the morning business as to supersede the regular order for the day.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say that as far as I am concerned I will proceed when the bill comes up here at any time. I am not asking to have the bill taken up now or to be heard now. When the bill comes up I shall be ready to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. THURMAN. I understand that the Committee on Indian Affairs is very anxious to have the views of the Senator from Colorado now. I move to postpone all previous orders and take the bill up, so that the Senator from Colorado can go on with his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to know whether that motion is properly in order under the rules, without unanimous consent.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that it is a motion to postpone the pending order, and a majority can do that. Such has been the practice of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no disposition to antagonize either the measure proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs or the measure in charge of the Senator from Ohio, but I do think that we ought to have some time for the consideration of the large number of bills reported from our committees and placed upon the Calendar. We have selected about an hour each day for the consideration of those cases, that is, after the expiration of the morning business and prior to half after one o'clock. That is certainly a small time to give to so many cases. We can during the residue of the day dispose of the bill of the Senator from Ohio and the Ute Indian bill. I hope that the Senate will not set aside the Calendar of General Orders now to take up any other bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I withdraw my motion and will let the Senate vote whether they will take the bill up and lay the Geneva award bill aside or whether they will proceed with the Geneva award bill. I shall insist on proceeding with the Geneva award bill at the expiration of the time fixed for the consideration of the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Ohio is withdrawn.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. There are several Senators I may state who mean to address the Senate upon the Geneva award bill. Does the Senator happen to know whether either of them is ready to proceed this morning?

Mr. THURMAN. I supposed from the way we have been pressed that everybody was ready to speak or vote or do anything else in regard to the Geneva award bill. I cannot imagine why there has been such a great pressure unless gentlemen are ready for everything.

Mr. CONKLING. For one I am ready to vote. Still I know there are several Senators who mean to address the Senate upon the Geneva award bill; two of them are present now; and I think it would inconvenience them to be driven to it to-day. I mention that to the Senator for whatever it may be worth in the arrangement to be made.

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator will yield to me a moment I will make a suggestion. There appears to be an indisposition to go on with the Ute Indian question this morning and I suggest that the Senate take up House joint resolution No. 237, which provides for a board of survey upon the iron-clad monitors that are now under construction by the Government. In this connection I should like to state that unless we act upon the joint resolution very quickly, we shall not have sufficient time to have the survey of those vessels made in time to make an appropriation at this session of Congress for their completion. It seems to me very important that we should dispose of that question, and I think we can dispose of it this morning before the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. COCKRELL. The joint resolution is on the Calendar?

Mr. McPHERSON. It is on the Calendar.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. My recollection is that on Thursday of last week, before we adjourned, there were several matters upon the Calendar specially assigned for this morning. One or two of them I know are pension cases. They do not involve so much money as the Geneva award, nor are they perhaps as important to the public at large as the joint resolution alluded to by the Senator from New Jersey, but they are of great importance to the individuals.

Mr. McPHERSON. This is a matter of great public importance.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yet I think we cannot do anything that really is of more importance than to see to it that the men who suffered for us during the war and who are now suffering because they have not received their dues are cared for as well. One of these cases is from West Virginia, which I know was assigned specially for consideration this morning. I shall protest against anything taking precedence of it, and I would interpose any objection under the rules, if I knew what the rules were, to prevent anything from taking its place this morning.

Mr. McPHERSON. I hope that no matter of a personal kind, particularly pension cases that we can act upon at any time, will be allowed to intervene before the consideration of this important public measure.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. We can act upon them any time if other things do not take their place; but these cases have been specially assigned for this morning, and why should they now be displaced?
